Summary

David Cameron announced the introduction of the Family Test in a speech in August 2014:

I said previously that I wanted to introduce a family test into government. Now that test is being formalised as part of the impact assessment for all domestic policies. Put simply that means every single domestic policy that government comes up with will be examined for its impact on the family.

In October 2014 the Department for Work and Pensions (DWP) published guidance on implementing the Family Test. The Test consists of five questions policy makers need to consider:

1. What kinds of impact might the policy have on family formation?
2. What kind of impact will the policy have on families going through key transitions such as becoming parents, getting married, fostering or adopting, bereavement, redundancy, new caring responsibilities, or the onset of a long-term health condition?
3. What impacts will the policy have on all family members' ability to play a full role in family life, including with respect to parenting and other caring responsibilities?
4. How does the policy impact families before, during and after couple separation?
5. How does the policy impact those families most at risk of deterioration of relationship quality and breakdown?

The application of the Family Test must be documented and the guidance asks Departments to consider publishing the outcomes but it is not a requirement. Very few Family Tests have been published to date.

MPs have asked numerous Parliamentary Questions about how the Test is being implemented, how many assessments have been carried out, and whether assessments will be published.

In March 2016 Implementing the Family Test: A review of progress one year on was published by The Family and Childcare Trust, Relate, and Relationship Foundation supported by 14 other charities. The organisations had written to 14 relevant Government Departments asking about the guidance they had issued on implementing the Family Test, and assessments they had carried out or published since its introduction in October 2014. The report contains the responses and questions the commitment of some Departments to implementing the Family Test.

There have been calls from some MPs, the Centre for Social Justice, and the Relationship Alliance, to make the Family Test a statutory requirement. This was the intention of Caroline Ansell's Private Member's Bill (PMB) which was introduced during the 2015-16 Parliamentary Session. The Government has resisted these calls, arguing that it would reduce the Test to a tick box exercise. Priti Patel, the Minister for Employment, set out the Government position during the Second Reading debate on Caroline Ansell's PMB:

Placing the family test on a legislative footing, however, runs the risk of turning the test into a tick-box exercise across Government Departments, when our ambition is to work across government with Departments to embed the benefits of thinking about policy from a family perspective at all stages of policy development, not just complying with legislative requirements.

1. What is The Family Test?

1.1 Announcement of the Family Test

The then Prime Minister, David Cameron, referred to the possibility of introducing a Family Test following the riots of August 2011:

So if we want to have any hope of mending our broken society, family and parenting is where we've got to start.

I've been saying this for years, since before I was Prime Minister, since before I was leader of the Conservative Party.

So: from here on I want a family test applied to all domestic policy.

If it hurts families, if it undermines commitment, if it tramples over the values that keeps people together, or stops families from being together, then we shouldn't do it.

More than that, we've got to get out there and make a positive difference to the way families work, the way people bring up their children...

...and we've got to be less sensitive to the charge that this is about interfering or nannying.

We are working on ways to help improve parenting - well now I want that work accelerated, expanded and implemented as quickly as possible.

This has got to be right at the top of our priority list.¹

It was not until August 2014 that a formal announcement of the introduction of a 'family test' was made:

The reality is that in the past the family just hasn't been central to the way government thinks. So you get a whole load of policy decisions which take no account of the family and sometimes make these things worse. Whether it's the benefits system incentivising couples to live apart or penalising those who go out to work - or whether it's excessive bureaucracy preventing loving couples from adopting children with no family at all.

We can't go on having government taking decisions like this which ignore the impact on the family.

I said previously that I wanted to introduce a family test into government. Now that test is being formalised as part of the impact assessment for all domestic policies. Put simply that means every single domestic policy that government comes up with will be examined for its impact on the family.²

The DWP was given responsibility for all relationship support policies, with "every government department to be held to account for the impact of their policies on the family".³

"Families are the best anti-poverty measure ever invented. They are a welfare, education and counselling system all wrapped up into one" David Cameron, January 2016

1.2 Department of Work and Pensions Guidance

In October 2014 the DWP issued Guidance for Government Departments on implementing the Family Test:

The objective of the Test is to introduce an explicit family perspective to the policy making process, and ensure that potential impacts on family relationships and functioning are made explicit and recognised in the process of developing new policy.⁴

The guidance sets out when and how Government Departments should apply the Test.

While public policy by definition impacts the lives of individuals, families, communities and society as a whole, there will be policies, which do not have any impact at the level of the family per se, or where the impact is small and indirect, or temporary in nature. Where that is the case it may not be sensible or proportionate to apply the test. If policy makers are unsure, they should reflect on the questions and the rest of this guidance. In most cases it will be obvious where a policy is not in scope, but the indirect impacts of policy on families are not always obvious. If in doubt it is recommended that the questions are addressed and any further analysis that is needed is carried out.⁵

The Family test is in the form of five questions which policy makers should reflect on during policy formulation:

- What kinds of impact might the policy have on family formation?
- What kind of impact will the policy have on families going through key transitions such as becoming parents, getting married, fostering or adopting, bereavement, redundancy, new caring responsibilities or the onset of a long-term health condition?
- What impacts will the policy have on all family members' ability to play a full role in family life, including with respect to parenting and other caring responsibilities?
- How does the policy impact families before, during and after couple separation?
- How does the policy impact those families most at risk of deterioration of relationship quality and breakdown?⁶

The guidance emphasises the need to consult widely when considering the Family Test questions:

While policy teams working on specific areas of family policy will have a good understanding of the impact of their policy on family relationships, expertise in this area largely sits outside of Government. Policy teams will need to engage with the evidence base and build their own understanding of how their Department's policies impact families. This will mean engaging with key stakeholders, using consultation processes to collect evidence, including family impacts in evaluation strategies and in some cases engaging directly with a diverse range of families, including children. The Open Policy Making approach encourages the use of a range of tools and techniques for engaging with stakeholders in developing policy and these should be considered when building the evidence base on how particular policies impact families.⁷

⁴ Department for Work and Pensions, Family Test: Guidance for Government Departments, 31 October 2014

⁵ Ibid.

⁶ Ibid.

The guidance states that Departments should document the assessments they carry out in an appropriate way as part of the policy making process:

Where a detailed assessment is carried out, departments should consider a standalone document to bring together their analysis. Departments should consider publishing assessments where they are carried out, and where policy is being submitted for collective agreement through the Cabinet Committee process, the assessment should be included alongside other policy documentation.⁸

1.3 Role of the Cabinet Committee on Social Justice

In June 2015 Iain Duncan Smith, the then Secretary of State for Work and Pensions, announced that Cabinet Committee on Social Justice would take the lead in ensuring that the Family Test is properly applied across Government Departments when responding to a PQ:

Asked by: Mr David Burrowes

May I welcome the introduction of the family test and the Secretary of State's lead on that? What is he doing to ensure that it does what the Prime Minister says it should do, which is change the way Government do business?

Answered by: Mr Duncan Smith | Department for Work and Pensions

This test will be reviewed through the Social Justice Cabinet Committee, which I chair. We intend, and the Prime Minister intends, that it will have teeth. We want to see an improvement in family life and greater support for those who have to juggle care for their children, care for elderly relatives and work. Through that process we hope to improve their lives.⁹

1.4 Caroline Ansell's Private Member's Bill

The Family Test is not currently a statutory requirement. In June 2015 Caroline Ansell came 20th in the Private Members' Bill Ballot for the 2015-16 Session. She opted to introduce the Assessment of Government Policies \(Impact on Families\) Bill 2015-16 the purpose of which is described below:

A Bill to require ministers to carry out an assessment of the impact of government policies on families by giving statutory effect to the family test; to place a duty on the Secretary of State to make a report on the costs and benefits of requiring local authorities to carry out equivalent tests on their policies; to require the Secretary of State to establish, and make an annual report on, indicators of

⁷ Ibid., p9

⁸ Ibid., p5

⁹ HC Deb 22 June 2012 c612

and targets for the government's performance in promoting family stability; and for connected purposes.¹⁰

The Bill was presented to Parliament on 24 June 2015. The debate on Second Reading began on Friday 4 December 2015. Caroline Ansell explained why she had introduced the Bill:

In that light, a whole host of questions have been put to Departments. They ask the Minister how many of his or her Department's policies have been assessed against the family test and what steps have been taken to publish the outcome of such an assessment. I regret to say that the answers to those questions have been rather limited. In many instances, the response was that the guidance urges only a consideration of publication, and therefore no publication had followed. There have been good examples of the assessment in relation to the Childcare Bill and the Education and Adoption Bill. However, the potential within the family test is as yet unrealised.¹¹

The Government opposed the Bill, Priti Patel, the Minister for Employment said:

Placing the family test on a legislative footing, however, runs the risk of turning the test into a tick-box exercise across Government Departments, when our ambition is to work across government with Departments to embed the benefits of thinking about policy from a family perspective at all stages of policy development, not just complying with legislative requirements.¹²

The debate was adjourned; the Bill did not progress and fell due to lack of parliamentary time.

2. Application of the Family Test

2.1 Parliamentary Questions

A number of PQs have been asked about the application of the Family Test in respect of particular policies and how it is being applied in individual departments. A list of PQs that have asked about the Family Test is included in the appendix to this paper.

For instance, Caroline Ansell asked Departments about training they had provided on the Family Test. Tim Loughton has asked Departments about what guidance they had given to support the implementation of the Test. Nic Dakin has asked Departments what steps they have taken to embed the Family Test in policy making. Kate Green has asked Departments about the guidance they have provided on implementing Family Test, and the number of policies assessed against the Family Test.

Many of the responses describe briefly what the Family Test is and refer to the guidance issued by DWP but provide little additional information.

David Burrowes has asked several questions about the Family Test since its introduction; for example:

Asked by: Burrowes, Mr David

To ask the Leader of the House, pursuant to his oral contribution of 10 March 2016, Official Report, column 444, whether he expects primary and secondary legislation to be subject to the family test and the results published.

Answering member: Chris Grayling | Department: Leader of the House

A Family Test was introduced by the Government in 2014 – it aims to bring a family perspective into policy making. It will ensure that impacts on family relationships and functioning, both positive and negative, are recognised in the process of policy development and help inform the policy decisions, and any subsequent legislation, made by Ministers.

The Test is not a ‘tick box’ or ‘pass v fail’ exercise, it is about thinking carefully how new policy can support or potentially undermine family relationships. Policy is always about trade-offs but the Family Test ensures family considerations are explicitly considered and recognised when making those trade-offs.

While the guidance encourages publication, there is no requirement to do so.¹³

David Burrowes also wrote an article on the Family Test for Conservative Home in June 2015 David Burrowes MP: Family policy – the litmus test for Cameron’s One Nation Government.

The Government has also referred to the Family Test in responses to some PQs, for instance:

Asked by: Bruce, Fiona

To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions, with reference to the Early Intervention Foundation review, What works to enhance interparental relationships and improve children's outcomes, commissioned by his Department and published on 22 March 2016, what steps he is taking to strengthen the policymaker's role in promoting awareness of the effect of the quality of the relationship between parents on their children.

¹³ PQ 33911, on [Legislation Family Test], 18 April 2016

Answering member: Caroline Nokes | Department: Department for Work and Pensions

The report presented by the Early Intervention Foundation shows that children exposed to frequent, intense and poorly resolved conflict between their parents are at risk of poorer long term outcomes. Since publication policymakers have engaged with the Early Intervention Foundation through conferences and seminars to increase their understanding of the report's findings.

This evidence is being used to inform our approach to developing policy for future relationship support provision. Since autumn 2015 we have been working with 12 local authorities to develop evidence-based strategic delivery plans to embed relationship support into local services for families.

In addition we introduced the Family Test in October 2014, which means that for the first time new Government policies will be assessed for their impact on the family. This ensures that family stability is at the heart of government policy making.¹⁴

2.2 Implementing the Family Test: A review of progress one year on Report

In March 2016 the Family and Childcare Trust, Relate and the Relationship Foundation, supported by 14 other charities, published Implementing the Family Test: A review of progress one year on. The report documented the responses of 14 Government Departments to requests for information on how they had incorporated and implemented the Family Test since its launch in October 2014.

Ten departments replied. The report states that five Departments (listed below) said that they had produced tailored guidance or tools to apply the Family Test:

- Department for Work and Pensions;
- Department for Education;
- HM Treasury;
- Department for Business Innovation and Skills; and
- Department of Energy and Climate Change.

Four departments (listed below), according to the report: "did not provide a meaningful response about how, or whether, the department is implementing the Family Test":¹⁵

- Home Office;
- Cabinet Office;

¹⁴ PQ 50589 on [Families: Government Assistance], 31 October 2016

¹⁵ Implementing the Family Test: a review of progress one year on, 29 March 2016

10 The Family Test

- Department for Health; and
- Department for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs.

The report concluded that: “the majority of departments have shown limited commitment to implementing the Family Test,”¹⁶ and raised concerns about the “variation” in departments’ responses to the Test.¹⁷ The report acknowledged that it is still early days, and may take some time for best practice to emerge, but expressed concern about the “absence of a transparent mechanism to record when the Test has been applied” because:

...this means that it is impossible to accurately assess how successfully the Test is being incorporated into the policy making process. There is little information available to the public about a process and little accountability for the Test. Whilst the Government rightly wishes to ensure that the Test does not become a ‘tick box’ exercise, this does not preclude recording and monitoring of its use.¹⁸

The report made the following recommendations:

Recommendations of Implementing the Family Test A review of progress on year on

- The Government should put the Family Test on a statutory footing.
- Departments should be required to publish a record of their Family Test assessments
- The Government should publish an annual review reporting on its performance.
- The Government should develop and publish tools and resources to support departments in applying the Family Test.
- The Government should examine the feasibility of a local Family Test.
- Devolved administrations should consider developing their own Family Tests.¹⁹

In April 2016 Baroness Lister asked the Government how it planned to respond to this report:

Asked by: Baroness Lister of Burtsett

To ask Her Majesty’s Government what plans they have to respond to the recommendations in Implementing the Family Test, a review of progress one year on by Relate, the Relationships Foundation and the Family and Childcare Trust.

Answered by: Baroness Altmann | Department: Department for Work and Pensions

DWP welcome the Family Test, a review of progress one year on by Relate, the Relationships Foundation and the Family and Childcare Trust. We will consider the findings of the report in the next phase of our Government wide strategy to improve the embedding and implementation of the family test.²⁰

2.3 The Centre for Social Justice, Where Next for the Family Test?

In March 2016 the Centre for Social Justice (CSJ) published: Where next for the Family Test?

The report made recommendations based on the outcome of a roundtable event which heard from people “with a range of expertise in government”.²¹

The CSJ supports putting the Family Test on a statutory footing, but also believes that there are other ways in which implementation could be strengthened.²²

Centre for Social Justice, recommendations

- Better Evidence of what helps and what hurts families:
Consequently the CSJ recommends that government departments collect and publish:
 - Evidence of how greater family stability would advance their own agenda, encouraging external experts to submit evidence for consideration;
 - How their departmental policy is supporting families and family stability;
 - What further steps they are planning to take to support family stability.
- Strengthen the Family Test:
in the formation of policy, departments would be asked to:
 - Apply the Test where relevant against this evidence base;
 - Publish their assessment of the Test;
 - Explain why the Test has not been applied where this is the case.
- Cabinet Committee on Social Justice to oversee the process and publish on an annual basis:
 - The objectives and targets of Government in relation to promoting strong and stable families;
 - The Government’s proposals and policies for meeting these objectives;
 - The indicators that must be measured for the purposes of assessing the Government’s progress towards these objectives; and
 - The data on which the family stability indicators are based.

2.4 Published Family Test Assessments

The Family Test must be considered for all new domestic policy but Departments are not obliged to publish them. A few that have been published are detailed below.

²¹ Centre for social justice, Where Next for the Family Test, March 2016

Department for Communities and Local Government Lifetime tenancies: equalities impact assessment, May 2016

This Equalities Impact Assessment mentions the Family Test under the protected characteristic of age. It considers the proportion of tenants with children and concludes that over time the measure will to limit lifetime tenancies in the social rented sector will have a positive impact on families, particularly overcrowded families.

Department for Business, Innovation and Skills, Higher Education and Research Bill Equality Analysis, May 2016

The following analysis of the Family Test implications of the Higher Education and Research Bill was provided in the Equalities Analysis:

Consideration of the Family Test

179. The Family Test was introduced on 31 October 2014. The objective of the test is to introduce an explicit family perspective to the policy making process, and ensure that potential impacts on family relationships and functioning are made explicit and recognised in the process of developing new policy.
180. Our assessment is that the policies covered in this Equality Analysis will not have a family impact beyond improved access to higher education and better employment prospects for graduates, which is positively associated with stable family formation.²³

The Green paper that preceded the bill had also included a consideration of the Family Test:

Department for Business, Innovation and Skills, FULFILLING OUR POTENTIAL Teaching Excellence, Social Mobility and Student Choice, November 2015

This considered that the policies would not have an impact on the areas covered by the five questions of the Family Test but asked for views on this in consultation responses.

Department for Business, Innovation and Skills, Devolving Sunday Trading Rules, Impact Assessment, March 2016²⁴

There were lots of requests from Members to publish the Family Test in relation to this legislation. The Department did publish it, but faced criticism on the basis that it was a little late in the day, as illustrated by the following PQ tabled by David Burrowes:

Asked by: David Burrowes

Following yesterday's deliberations on Sunday trading, may I congratulate the Government on the precedent they have set in the publication of the family test alongside new legislation, even though it was published too late, coming as it did just a few hours before Report? It helpfully conceded the negative impact of the proposals on the family. Will the Leader of the House confirm that for all primary and secondary legislation, a family test will be published at the beginning, rather than at the end, of proceedings? In addition, will he inform us of what will happen if legislation does not pass the family test?

²³ Department for Business, Innovation and skills, Higher Education and Research Bill - Equality Analysis, May 2016, p40

Answering member: Chris Grayling

The purpose of impact assessments and things such as the family test is to enable the House to take an informed decision. Such tests are less a bar over which a measure needs to jump than a package of measures on which the House can form its decisions. The Government's intention remains to keep the House as fully informed as possible so that it can take those decisions.²⁵

The Family Test was considered as part of the Impact assessment. The Assessment identifies three impacts on the family:

Positive

- Greater employment opportunities which may ease families' financial problems especially if paid a Sunday premium and more flexibility making working-time childcare easier.
- Shops being open longer gives families greater flexibility over when they do their shopping.

Negative

- Working on Sundays may interfere with family time, especially if other members of the family work Monday to Friday. Saturday, workers may feel pressurised to work Sundays. This could be mitigated by the right to opt-out of Sunday working.

About the Library

The House of Commons Library research service provides MPs and their staff with the impartial briefing and evidence base they need to do their work in scrutinising Government, proposing legislation, and supporting constituents.

As well as providing MPs with a confidential service we publish open briefing papers, which are available on the Parliament website.

Every effort is made to ensure that the information contained in these publicly available research briefings is correct at the time of publication. Readers should be aware however that briefings are not necessarily updated or otherwise amended to reflect subsequent changes.

If you have any comments on our briefings please email papers@parliament.uk. Authors are available to discuss the content of this briefing only with Members and their staff.

If you have any general questions about the work of the House of Commons you can email hcenquiries@parliament.uk.
