CULTURAL EDUCATION IN ENGLAND

An independent review by Darren Henley for the Department for Culture, Media and Sport and the Department for Education.
1.0 INTRODUCTION

1.1 This independent review of Cultural Education in England follows on from the independent review of Music Education in England, which I undertook towards the end of 2010, at the request of the Secretary of State for Education and the Minister for Culture, Communications and Creative Industries.

1.2 Once again, I start my Review with a strong declaration of interest. I believe that all children can and should benefit from receiving a wide-ranging, adventurous and creative Cultural Education. For many young people, cultural activities form a vital part of their everyday lives. These activities are academically, physically and socially enriching, whether they take place in-school or out-of-school.

1.3 The skills which young people learn from studying Cultural Education subjects help to ensure that the UK has over many years built up a Creative and Cultural Industries sector which is, in many areas, world-beating. There is a clear message from the Creative and Cultural Industries that the education which children and young people receive in school in Creative and Cultural subjects has a direct bearing on feeding into the talent pool for those who take up employment in this sector.

1.4 Sustained investment in providing young people with an excellent Cultural Education should form a key pillar of the government’s strategy for the long-term growth of our Creative and Cultural Industries, both at a national and international level. It is vitally important that there is continued investment in giving the next generation of creative practitioners the tools and training necessary for the UK to continue its position of pre-eminence.

1.5 The scope of this Review is far wider than my previous work, which concentrated on one single subject. For the purposes of this Review, Cultural Education includes: archaeology, architecture and the built environment, archives, craft, dance, design, digital arts, drama and theatre, film and cinemas, galleries, heritage, libraries, literature, live performance, museums, music, poetry and the visual arts. Throughout this document, I use terms such as ‘Cultural Education’, ‘Cultural subjects’ and ‘Cultural practitioners’. No inference should be made from my choice of descriptor at any given moment during the report. By using these umbrella terms, it is my intention to include all of the individual areas listed above. On occasions, I give examples taken from individual areas of my remit. Again, no inference should be made from my choice of examples, which is not intended to convey the relative importance of any one art form or discipline over any other. To read any such meaning into my words would be wholly incorrect.
1.6 As I undertook a very detailed Review of Music Education in England only a few months ago, I do not propose to revisit this area in great depth in this new Review, which should be seen as a companion document. However, it should be noted that music remains an integral part of the overall Cultural Education offer. Music Education in England can be downloaded here:

with the government’s response available here:

1.7 I am grateful for the very encouraging response to the publication of my first Review both from individuals and organisations involved in delivering Music Education and from the government, which has recently published the first National Plan for Music Education in England, as a direct result of one of the recommendations in my original Review. I look forward to seeing the continued development of many of the ideas outlined in the Review over the coming months. The Importance of Music: A National Plan for Music Education can be downloaded here:

1.8 The recent Schools White Paper The Importance of Teaching, published by the Department for Education, stated that ‘Children should expect to be given a rich menu of cultural experiences’. In the next few pages, I hope to make the case for ensuring that all children and young people in England, no matter what their background, circumstances or location, receive the highest quality Cultural Education both in school and out of school, in formal and in informal settings. I will set out why I believe the receipt of an excellent education in cultural subjects is in itself intrinsically valuable for children and young people. The vision for Cultural Education in England, which I outline as a result of this Review, embraces the gaining of knowledge, the development of understanding and the acquisition of skills. To be clear from the outset, I do not believe that there is a need for anyone to be apologetic about children and young people learning about culture and taking part in cultural activities as a highly valuable part of their rounded education. While they are learning, many children and young people will also discover the sheer enjoyment of taking part in cultural activities, whether that is as an active participant or as a more passive consumer. As well as developing the argument for the rich provision of Cultural Education both in school and out-of-school, this report goes on to describe the structural and funding changes, which I believe are required to make this vision a reality.

1.9 As with my Review of Music Education, I am not working to a budget given to me by the Department for Education and the Department for Culture, Media and Sport. Having said that, I remain mindful of the restrictions on government spending, so I have tried to ensure that my recommendations are pragmatic, both in terms of government’s ability to deliver them and in terms of their potential financing. I remain convinced that none of my recommendations should be beyond the realms of budgetary possibilities for the two government departments.

1.10 Just as I did with my Review of Music Education, I have relied heavily on a huge number of people who have shared with me their own experiences and expertise in the area of Cultural Education and I owe them a great debt of gratitude in helping me to complete this Review. It has been a journey of discovery for me personally and without the detailed written responses from 654 individuals and organisations, the Review would have been nowhere near as well informed or as all encompassing. I would particularly like to take this opportunity to thank the 121 people, who discussed parts of this Review with me in person, and the further large group of individuals who made a significant contribution through roundtable discussions. Their knowledge was invaluable in helping me along the journey towards my final recommendations to government. A full list of these individuals and organisations can be found in Annexes 3, 4 and 5.

1.11 As with any document of this nature, I know that not everyone who took part in making written or verbal submissions to the Review will welcome or agree with every part of what I have to say. However, I want to assure them that I have personally read the written submissions and I have listened hard and reflected upon all of the verbal evidence sessions.

1.12 I would like to place on record my very sincere thanks to the Minister for Culture, Communications and Creative Industries, Ed Vaizey MP, for asking me to undertake this Review on behalf of the Department for Culture, Media and Sport and the Department for Education. The fact that this Review has taken place at all is down to his personal recognition of the importance of Cultural Education and his passion for the subject. I would also like to thank the Secretary of State for Education, the Rt Hon Michael Gove MP and the Secretary of State for Culture, the Olympics, Media and Sport, the Rt Hon Jeremy Hunt MP for their invaluable support for the Review. During the course of preparing this document, I have also held very productive meetings with the Tourism and Heritage Minister, John Penrose MP, and the Schools Ministers, Nick Gibb MP and Lord Hill of Oareford. All have been very generous with their time and very open and receptive in the discussions which we held. I am also grateful to the Co-Chairs of the Liberal Democrat Parliamentary Culture, Media and Sport Committee, the Rt Hon Don Foster MP and Baroness Bonham-Carter of Yarnbury for the benefit of their advice and encouragement in an area in which they both have considerable experience. I am very hopeful that the supportive meetings, which I have held with members of both parties in the coalition, are an indicator that the government's response to the recommendations contained within this Review will be both speedy and positive.

1.13 I have received a great deal of help and advice from officials at the Department for Culture, Media and Sport and at the Department for Education during the course of undertaking this Review. I am particularly grateful to Kirsty Leith from the DCMS, who has guided me throughout the Review with great insight and good humour. Among her colleagues at the DCMS, I would also like to express my thanks to: Clare Pillman, Paul Kirkman, Helen Williams, Chris Atkins, Dilnaaz Kazi, Laura Rigby, Becky Guiblin, Peter Karpinski, Nick Cady, Steve Darke, Wendy Shales, Abby Smith, Keith Nichol, James Stevens, Harriet Buxton, David Gookey, Steven Edwards, Hugh Muckian, Craig Westwood, Jas Kaur and Leonie Philips. At the Department for Education, I would like to express my thanks to: David Russell, Jenny Loosley, Andy Tyerman, Angela Ruggles, Chris Carraro, Barbara Tucker, Shanti Rebello and Paul McDonald.

1.14 I am also grateful to Arts Council England, the Big Lottery Fund, the British Film Institute, English Heritage and the Heritage Lottery Fund for all of the assistance that senior staff of these organisations have afforded me during the past few months.

1.15 Once the government's response is published, I would encourage all of those individuals and organisations involved in every aspect of Cultural Education to work together in partnership with local and national government to help to build on the aspects of the system that currently work well; to be unafraid to change the things that are failing or could be done better; and to ensure that the largest amount of money possible is invested directly for the benefit of children and young people.

1.16 I have been given no guarantees whatsoever that the conclusions of this independent Review will automatically become the coalition government's policy. However, I am hopeful that the government will be able to adopt many, if not all, of the recommendations in the following pages.

1.17 Throughout the evidence sessions, which I have undertaken during the process of writing this Review, I have been struck time and time again by the passion for Cultural Education from those people working in the sector. I believe that the best possible outcome for this Review would be the creation of a Cultural Education system that is truly the envy of the world. This will be achieved by building on past successes; by gaining a deep understanding of what does and does not work today; by developing a meaningful vision for what the future should hold; by making best use of exciting developments in new technology; and by government, funders and other public sector, private sector and voluntary organisations working together for the common good. The true test of this will be whether we can create a generation of young people whom we have enabled to achieve their full potential in this area. There is already so much that we are doing right in Cultural Education in England. I very much hope that, as a result of this Review, the coalition government, local government, the lottery funders and sponsored bodies seize the initiative and commit to building on the firm foundations which already exist.
2.0 THE CULTURAL EDUCATION LANDSCAPE

2.1 There is a wealth of Cultural Education being offered to children and young people across England. The world of Cultural Education is driven by partnership, with government departments, non-departmental government bodies, the National Lottery, local authorities, schools, cultural organisations, voluntary organisations, the creative and cultural industries, conservation practitioners, business sponsors, charities and philanthropists all contributing.

2.2 This partnership-driven ecology greatly benefits children. The job of this Review is to build on the achievements that are already being made, while at the same time making suggestions about how Cultural Education in England could be made even better.

2.3 Schools remain the single most important place where children learn about Cultural Education. This takes the form of structured curriculum lessons in subjects such as history, English literature, art and design, design technology, drama, dance, film studies and music, alongside programmes of after school activities for children who wish to pursue a passion for a particular art form.

2.4 The best performing schools bring Cultural Education practitioners into schools, alongside classroom teachers, to share their knowledge with pupils. These include artists, designers, historians, writers, poets, actors, musicians, curators, archivists, film-makers, dancers, librarians, architects and digital arts practitioners. Many of these in-school experiences are provided by cultural organisations, who have dedicated education departments, or by private sector companies from within the Creative and Cultural Industries.

2.5 While it remains of paramount importance to ensure that schools provide safe environments within which children can learn, I am concerned that an over emphasis on repetitive and costly CRB checks for practitioners working in schools can dissuade schools from engaging with this outside expertise. Proposals to simplify this area of regulation are to be welcomed.

2.6 Cultural organisations and venues (such as museums, galleries, concert halls, theatres, cinemas and heritage sites) offer children and young people the opportunity to visit places of specific interest, which can deepen their understanding of the world around them and provide fresh insight into their studies.

2.7 Funders such as Arts Council England, the British Film Institute, the Big Lottery Fund and the Heritage Lottery Fund are important drivers in making Cultural Education available to young people. Their investment can be directed very effectively towards making a real difference on both a national and local level, although currently there is an absence of strategic oversight of how this money is being spent in its totality.

2.8 Local Authorities have a vitally important role to play in ensuring the lives of young people in their area are enriched with cultural activities and this should never be underestimated. Part of the patchiness that is evident in the delivery of Cultural Education in England is due to varying levels of prioritisation of culture by different Local Authorities across the country. Although the demands on Local Authority funding are currently under pressure from many different directions, the provision of locally funded Cultural Education should be recognised as being extremely important to both large and small communities everywhere in England.

2.9 Many schools are now moving out of direct Local Authority funding to become Academies or Free Schools. It is important that children and young people continue to be able to access a high standard of Cultural Education in their local areas throughout this period of change. I would encourage Headteachers and Governors of Academies and Free Schools to work closely with Cultural Education providers in their area, including Local Authorities, to ensure that this continues to be the case.

2.10 The role of voluntary organisations and volunteers in providing aspects of Cultural Education is a vital part of the ecology. Many voluntary groups give children and young people the opportunity to perform, to create and to learn about a variety of aspects of culture. An important part of this experiential learning takes place in more informal youth settings (such as youth clubs). In sectors such as Heritage and Museums and Galleries, much valuable learning is passed on to young people from organisations which are largely staffed by knowledgeable and dedicated volunteers, many of whom have developed great expertise in their chosen area. In schools themselves, voluntary projects, which bring adults into schools, to help, for example with developing reading skills, provide a valuable service to young people, alongside the work of classroom teachers. There are a multitude of fine examples of the Big Society in action across the Cultural Education world. This should be both recognised and celebrated.

2.11 Charities also perform an important role in this sector, with the vast majority of publicly funded cultural organisations holding charitable status. The role of philanthropists in providing funding for education projects is significant and this area is likely to benefit from any initiatives introduced by the government to encourage further charitable giving. There are a number of major forces for good in this area, operating as charitable trusts, such as the Clore Duffield Foundation and the Paul Hamlyn Foundation, both of which have made a significant and sustained contribution to Cultural Education in England.
2.12 In recent years, many arts and heritage organisations (such as festivals, galleries, orchestras and venues) have developed outreach and audience development projects, which involve children and young people with their work in a sustained and meaningful way. This happens both with those organisations that are publicly funded and also in many cases with those organisations that do not receive public funding but, nevertheless, choose to make this a part of their work.

2.13 The Cultural Olympiad, which has been taking place in the run-up to the 2012 Olympic and Paralympic Games, contains many fine examples of cultural programmes, which will actively engage children and young people. These include Tate Movie Project’s The Itch of the Golden Nit, created by thousands of children across the UK; and Film Nation Shorts, a project giving 14-25 year olds the chance to make films celebrating the values of the Olympic and Paralympic Games. There are many, many more fantastic examples, which I could have chosen to illustrate this point.

2.14 The Creative and Cultural Industries also play an important part in funding specific Cultural Education projects, with commercial theatre, music promoters, record companies, hardware manufacturers, digital media specialists, film production companies, film distributors and exhibitors, retailers, radio and television broadcasters, architects, conservation practices and music and book publishers all playing a significant role in delivering aspects of Cultural Education. This important contribution should be widely acknowledged for the value it brings. There can sometimes be a tendency for private sector initiatives to be forgotten, with focus often shifting to publicly funded projects. However, many of the Cultural Education projects funded by the Creative and Cultural Industries either directly, or indirectly via sponsorship, form a central part of the overall Cultural Education picture. I note that many of the private companies from a number of different areas of the Creative and Cultural Industries, whom I have consulted, stressed that there was a real value for them in working on programmes that were directly tied to the school curriculum, rather than those which were seen as add-on extras. This should be borne in mind in the development of any future initiatives by government where private sector organisations form part of the funding mix.

2.15 Cultural Education is also delivered by privately owned providers in areas such as music, dance and drama. Much of this provision is of a high standard and helps children and young people to develop a passion for taking part in cultural activities. There is a relationship between children’s membership of these groups and the ability of their parents to afford to pay. This particular sector of Cultural Education tends not to be as available to young people from economically challenging backgrounds.

2.16 New technological developments mean that it is easier for young people themselves to make a significant contribution to the cultural lives of people of all ages. Access to the digital world makes it more straightforward for young people to engage, create and critique products, events and activities being created both on their own doorsteps and around the world. This technology is developing and changing all the time and it is important that everyone involved in Cultural Education ensures that what young people learn remains relevant to the world around them.
3.0 THE CASE FOR CULTURAL EDUCATION

3.1 There are a myriad of different reasons why every child in England should receive the best possible Cultural Education. I have already mentioned some of the key factors in the introduction to this Review; others I will expand upon later. In this chapter, I will concentrate on three particular sets of benefits of Cultural Education:

- The direct educational benefits to children through the acquisition of knowledge and skills from Cultural Education subjects.

- The additional benefits to the Creative and Cultural Industries and the wider economy of providing children with an excellent Cultural Education that in turn creates the workforce of the future, helping to drive forward the UK’s growth agenda.

- The wider benefits to our society as a whole of developing an understanding of our common cultural heritage.

3.2 At its best, a sound Cultural Education should allow children to gain knowledge through the learning of facts; understanding through the development of their critical faculties and skills through the opportunity to practise specific art forms. Involvement with cultural activities, whether as an active participant (creating a piece of art or craft, reading a book, making a short film) or actively experiencing an event or place (visiting a heritage site, gallery or museum, seeing how a building works, watching a music, dance, or film performance) can be habit forming for the rest of a young person’s life.

3.3 However, it should be noted that the quality of the interaction is of utmost importance. A poor experience during childhood could risk putting a child off future similar cultural activities into adulthood. So, it remains vitally important that all interactions that children and young people have in this area are of high quality, particularly if they are experiencing a specific area of culture for the very first time. It is equally important that there is a common understanding of exactly what excellence in the delivery of Cultural Education means; a subject to which I will return later. It should also be noted that, for much the same reason, it is essential that the experiences to which children are introduced are appropriate for their age. At the right time in a child’s development, a particular cultural activity could excite and invigorate them; if it happens too early or too late in their learning development, there is a risk that it could leave them either bewildered or bored.

3.4 In his letter asking me to undertake this Review, the Minister for Culture, Communications and Creative Industries, Ed Vaizey MP, wrote:
‘Government recognises the important contribution that our great cultural institutions make to education and intends to support access to and appreciation of the arts and culture’.

‘Public funding should be used primarily to meet the government priorities of every child having a solid cultural education’.

3.5 The Importance of Teaching, the Schools White Paper published in 2010, made clear reference to the value of Cultural Education in schools and to this Review:

‘Children should expect to be given a rich menu of cultural experiences. So we have commissioned Darren Henley to explore how we can improve music education and have more children learning to play an instrument. The Henley Review will also inform our broader approach to cultural education. We will support access to live theatre, encourage the appreciation of the visual and plastic arts and work with our great museums and libraries to support their educational mission’.

3.6 I warmly welcome this clear and unambiguous statement of intent from the coalition government. It is unquestionably true that Cultural subjects such as art and design, design technology, dance, drama, film studies, music, history and English literature form a vital part of any child’s education. However, there is a growing concern that, with the exception of the latter two subjects, this area of education is no longer valued as much as it once was in our schools or in Further or Higher Education. I would encourage ministers in the Department for Education, the Department for Business, Innovation and Skills and the Department for Culture, Media and Sport swiftly to take action as a result of this Review to show that these concerns are misplaced.

3.7 Although this Review is by no means solely focused on Cultural Education within schools, school will inevitably form the most significant part of a child’s education. This is particularly the case with children who come from the most deprived backgrounds. In these instances, many of their parents and carers may themselves not have been lucky enough to benefit from a wide-ranging Cultural Education. There is therefore a gap in understanding and experience among the influential adults in these children’s lives. More needs to be done to ensure that the value of cultural activities and experiences for everyone, no matter what their background, is widely understood. There are also challenges in accessing Cultural Education facing Looked After Children and Children with Special Educational Needs and Disabilities and children outside mainstream education and training.
3.8 It is important to note that the introduction of Cultural Education to children before they go to school is of clear benefit. This can be through engagement with books, language and rhymes; singing, dancing and rhythms; or painting, drawing and making things. I was impressed to learn about some of the innovative programmes, like Letterbox Club and Bookstart under the auspices of the charity Booktrust as well as the introduction of Dolly Parton’s Imagination Library. These offer mechanisms for ensuring books reach all young children, and are often excellent examples of public and private money being harnessed together, with support from industry, to deliver a Cultural Education programme.

3.9 Cultural Education should not exist in a vacuum; the organisations delivering it should be prepared to take cultural learning into settings where children and young people already spend their time. This might include youth clubs, playgroups or sporting venues. The Legacy Trust UK’s somewhereto project is a good example of a programme where young people are defining their own space to perform, enjoy and develop their culture. It helps them to find ways to access the spaces they need, whether it is to take part in sport, dance, or music, making art or showing their films.

3.10 Cultural activities should form a central part of any strategy developed by central and local government in the delivery of educational and recreational activities for the wellbeing of teenagers. It is likely that such a strategy would vary from local area to local area, however there is no doubt in my mind that a full range of cultural activities should be on offer to young people.

3.11 Children of all races and genders should be able to connect to the Cultural Education that they receive. It is important that that no minority groups are forgotten in any strategic changes that take place as a result of this Review.

3.12 Much has been written about the value of Cultural Education as a means of school improvement or as a tool for achieving high impact social action projects. This is certainly the case and during the course of conducting both this Review and my previous Music Education Review I have encountered some extraordinarily powerful examples of this at work. However, this should never be the primary reason for teaching children about Culture. Instead, the individual subjects which go together to make up Cultural Education are worthwhile in their own right. To be clear, I am not advocating learning dance or music instead of English or Mathematics. Clearly that would be wrong. However, Cultural Education subjects should be recognised for the intellectual rigour and practical skills that they teach a child, rather than merely as a 'nice to have' add-on, or as part of a more far reaching School Improvement programme. I believe that there should be a clear signal from government that these subjects are both valuable and valued as part of the whole package of education on offer to children.

3.13 When taught well, Cultural Education includes three particular elements. The first is knowledge-based and teaches children about the best of what has been created (for example great literature, art, architecture, film, music and drama). It introduces young people to a broader range of cultural thought and creativity than they would be likely to encounter in their lives outside of school.

3.14 The second part of Cultural Education centres on the development of analytical and critical skills, which additionally have a direct relevance across other subjects outside the scope of this Review. This is especially important in heritage and history, where the subject could otherwise be reduced to the accumulation of facts, rather than also including the acquisition of an understanding of historical context.

3.15 The third element of Cultural Education is skills based and enables children to participate in and to create new culture for themselves (for example designing a product, drawing, composing music, choreographing a production, or making a short film). It is important to note that, when delivered well, Cultural Education should not just be about visiting museums, galleries or heritage sites, or about seeing performances, although all of these remain important parts of the whole package of Cultural Education. Often, Cultural Education activities will be collaborative and will help children to learn how to work together as a team. However, it is essential that children and young people are encouraged to undertake regular solo activities, such as reading books, writing stories, drawing pictures, learning crafts or making music. Over time, they will get better at doing each of these things, as they build up skills and knowledge through repetitive practice. It is important to remember that becoming proficient in these solo activities can have a profound effect on a child's development; they should not be overshadowed by other group or experience based facets of Cultural Education.

3.16 Despite wishing to see Cultural Education subjects recognised for their own intrinsic worth, it would be remiss of me not to note that our best achieving schools tend to offer a high standard of Cultural Education to their pupils; with excellent facilities and teaching in areas such as art and design, design technology, music and the performing arts. This cultural activity – and the value placed upon it within the school environment – in itself creates a culture of learning and behaviour within schools. Alongside the primary benefit of learning about culture for its own sake, this has the secondary benefit of engaging many children with their general schooling to a far greater extent than might otherwise be the case.

3.17 However, simply increasing capacity in terms of making facilities and opportunities available to children and young people in schools should not be regarded as a 'quick fix'. It is also necessary to ensure that expectations of standards in school leadership and teaching of Cultural Education subjects are set at a high level both in curriculum subjects and in more informal in-school settings.
3.18 Although welcome emphasis has been given by the government to the teaching of English literature and to History, other Cultural Education subjects in schools should not be seen as an easy option and therefore for less academically able children. They add to the sum of academic achievement and knowledge of a pupil, as well as helping them to learn skills, which will benefit them both as individuals in their adult life and as potential employees in the world of work. I am concerned to learn from many of the teachers who have contributed to this Review that some more academically able young people are being steered away from subjects which might form the basis for their future employment within the Creative and Cultural Industries.

3.19 England has an excellent reputation on the international stage for its creative output. It can be argued that our influence on literature, design, cinema, museums, the visual arts, music and the presentation of our heritage assets internationally is disproportionately large for a country of our relatively small size. These are also areas in which we have traditionally been admired from abroad for our achievements in the related education sector. It would be highly regrettable if this international reputation for excellence was allowed to decline in any way.

3.20 Any downgrading of investment in the area of Cultural Education or in the status of the subjects that are required by the Creative and Cultural Industries for future employees could pose a serious risk to the revenues earned by UK plc. It is significant that China, Singapore and other emerging economies place great store in strengthening their own Cultural Education as one of the building blocks for investing in the future of their countries. This is of particular relevance at a time when the government is focusing on economic growth as one of its key policy areas.

3.21 In a report published in 2011 entitled Skills for the Creative Industries: Investing in the Talents of our People, the CBI argued:

“The creative sector has huge growth potential. By 2013, the sector is expected to employ 1.3 million people, potentially greater than financial services. The digital and creative industries are a natural export strength for the UK, providing the UK’s third largest export sector – only behind advanced engineering and financial and professional services.”

3.22 It is important that independent careers advice given to young people who wish to work in the Creative and Cultural Industries by their schools is of a high standard, with particular reference to fast developing areas of technology. It is imperative that young people are made aware of the full range of opportunities available to them across the Creative and Cultural Industries - particularly those careers that operate ‘behind the scenes’ away from the glare of publicity, which might not be immediately apparent to a young person considering their options for the world of work. Independent careers guidance provided through their schools should help young people to gain knowledge of available jobs, as well as informing them of the subjects that they need to study to stand the best chance of gaining skilled employment in their chosen area. It is also important that careers advice signposts young people towards the right Further and Higher Education courses to enable them to increase the probability of gaining employment.

3.23 The skills, which children acquire through good Cultural Education, help to develop their personality, abilities and imagination. They allow them to learn how to think both creatively and critically and to express themselves fully. All of these skills are strong influencers on wider academic attainment in schools and help to grow a child’s interest in the process of learning within the school environment.

3.24 Understanding the Impact of Engagement of Culture and Sport - a report published in 2010 by the Culture and Sport Evidence Programme (a joint programme of strategic research led by the Department for Culture, Media and Sport in collaboration with Arts Council England, English Heritage and Sport England) - underlined the positive effect that Cultural Education could have on young people’s overall academic attainment:

‘Participation in structured arts activities improves young people’s cognitive abilities... Participation of young people in such activities could increase their cognitive ability test scores by 16% and 19%, on average, above that of non-participants (all other things being equal).’

3.25 Recently, the expert panel for the National Curriculum Review, chaired by Tim Oates, has published its recommendations (The Framework for the National Curriculum Review. DfE, 2011). I was greatly encouraged to read that the panel recognized that art and music lessons not only have ‘intrinsic worth’ in their own right, but also bring ‘benefits to pupil engagement, cognitive development and achievement, including in mathematics and reading’.

3.26 The coalition government has underlined a particular commitment to improving standards of literacy and also to the teaching of history. This is a welcome development; only by becoming proficient in reading will young people be able to unlock the knowledge contained in the written word. Individuals and organisations within the heritage sector have warmly welcomed the focus on history as a subject, as this has a particular relevance to their work. English Literature and History are both extremely important subjects, falling within the scope of Cultural Education, as defined by the remit of this Review. But, it is also important that other subjects within this area are also given the prominence that they deserve.
Fostering creativity in cultural learning is an important part of every child’s education. However, there is a risk that the ‘creativity agenda’ has come to mean a particular style of education, which does not place sufficient value on the development of a child’s understanding of cultural practice, or of fact-based knowledge about culture. At the same time, those who advocate a pure ‘knowledge agenda’ fail to value the skills and experiences that engagement with cultural activities can bring to a child’s education. Excellence in Cultural Education should be a synthesis of these two schools of thought. Creativity is not an alternative to academic learning, for those children who are less able in subjects such as Maths or English. Nor should the opportunity for creativity be limited for more academically able students because they are steered away from the chance to study Cultural Education subjects. There is a risk that the importance of Cultural Education is devalued unless it is seen as part of the entire curriculum offering for young people.

I would suggest that young people can only become more creative by learning distinct skills (the ‘tools of the trade’) and by learning about the techniques, views and influences of great writers, artists, film-makers and musicians. I would argue that children and young people should receive a Cultural Education, which is fuelled by the desire to share both creativity and knowledge. The two should never be seen as being mutually exclusive. An excellent Cultural Education will help children to learn how to be creative, while at the same time helping them to learn about creative and cultural subjects.

The concept of creativity in the teaching of subjects such as Maths, Geography and Science is a valuable one. I want to make it very clear that I do not intend to suggest that creativity is the sole preserve of the subject areas which fall within my remit. However, I do not propose to examine the use of creativity in the teaching of the subjects beyond the scope of this Review. Rather, I will be limiting discussion to the subject areas outlined in paragraph 1.5. To be clear, it should not be inferred that I regard the use of creativity in the teaching of other subjects as lacking in validity or importance; rather, it is beyond the scope of this Review.

One of the less tangible, but nonetheless important, benefits of a rounded Cultural Education is that it gives us an understanding of where we find ourselves at any given moment on a continuum of cultural development. Schools perform a valuable role in encouraging children to explore and to discover. Without Cultural Education in schools, there is a risk that children would face a disconnection from great writers, artists and musicians. The best of these established works of art are as relevant and brilliant today as they were when they were first created.

By reading and learning about the works of the great authors, poets and playwrights of the past, we can understand the development of literature and drama in the 20th and 21st centuries and the place of brand new works as part of the continuous reinvention of these genres. The same is true for other art forms, such as music or the visual arts. The great composers or painters of hundreds of years ago inform our understanding of the musicians and artists who are producing ground-breaking work today. Similarly, the British influence on film is immense and informs much of the thinking on the way that the cinema of today is being made around the world. Whether it be names from the past such as Charlie Chaplin and Alfred Hitchcock, or the latest box office success such as Danny Boyle and Tom Hooper, Britain continues to lead the way in many areas of film-making. Britain also has exceptional talent in technical fields such as audio-visual effects and computer graphics. It is important that the government does everything it can to ensure that there continues to be a flow of home grown talent through our education system into this area, as it continues to grow in importance within Britain’s Creative and Cultural Industries.

3.32 Any rounded Cultural Education should have space to include newer art-forms, which have yet to pass the test of time, alongside the very best creativity from times gone by. It is important that children are exposed to new practices and new ways of creating, whether this is through the use of innovative digital technology, or a new take on more established thinking. The young people studying these subjects should be equipped with the knowledge and understanding to enable them to make informed value judgements about their own personal preferences, based on their learning. The curriculum in this area should give weight both to the new and the old, better to enable a greater understanding of the way in which culture has developed over time.

3.33 Developments in digital technology continue to revolutionise the way in which Cultural Education subjects are taught in the formal school environment. Alongside this, the changing digital landscape affords young people significant opportunities to enjoy creative arts in new and exciting ways that speak to their own youth culture in more informal settings. This informal learning by young people should also be valued, as it often has a particular relevance to skills that may enhance their future employability across a wide range of different sectors, not just those in the Creative and Cultural Industries. By the end of 2012, virtually every cinema screen will be digital. This opens up huge possibilities for the dissemination of cultural learning across the country, with a distribution network that is both high quality and economically efficient. Government, schools and funders need to ensure that they keep up with innovations in this area; with policy being developed that is mindful of a forward looking, rather than backward looking, agenda.

3.34 Aside from visits to historic sites, an important part of the heritage area of Cultural Education is the creation of an understanding of a sense of place for children and young people. The implications of disconnection from a young person’s built environment have significant consequences, with potentially greater levels of vandalism and anti-social behaviour.
3.35 Cultural Education in general - and specifically taking part in cultural activities - can also be a major contributor to helping a young person to develop a sense of their own identity and a shared understanding and appreciation of the environment within which they live and their own personal role within that environment. This operates on a number of levels, whether it is in a school, a community, a village, town or city, or in gaining an appreciation of how British culture is viewed internationally.

3.36 It may seem very obvious to those people whose lives have already been enriched by an excellent Cultural Education, but it is worth underlining at this point, that the journey of discovery through culture, together with the opportunity to experience cultural activities, is enjoyable. Cultural Education is enriching both in academic and skills-based terms. But it is also fun. And we should never be ashamed of that.

RESEARCH FROM THE USA

3.37 During the course of undertaking this Review, my thinking has benefitted greatly from both the written and verbal evidence submissions that I have received. I have been provided with a broad range of research data and anecdotal examples. These insights have informed the recommendations that follow. The Cultural Learning Alliance (CLA) has undertaken an important piece of work, which pulls together the existing evidence that promotes best practice and makes the case for Cultural Education.

3.38 I want to highlight some of the arguments from one particular document from the USA, which in my opinion, particularly effectively puts forward the case for the benefits of a strong Cultural Education for children and young people.

3.39 In May 2011, in the USA, the President’s Committee on the Arts and the Humanities (the First Lady, Michelle Obama, is the Honorary Chairman) published a reported entitled Reinvesting in Arts Education: Winning America’s Future Through Creative Schools. It contains a good deal of research from American schools, which provides a meaningful insight into the value of Cultural Education, and which is of direct relevance to this Review. Its arguments are clear and compelling:

“The study of drama, dance, music, and the visual arts helps students explore realities, relationships, and ideas that cannot be conveyed simply in words or numbers. The ability to perform and create in the fine arts engenders innovative problem-solving skills that students can apply to other academic disciplines and provides experiences working as a team.”
Equally important, arts instruction supports success in other subjects.”

3.40 The American report discusses seven studies identified by the Arts Education Partnership showing ‘the pattern of linkage between high levels of arts participation and higher grades and test scores in math and reading’. (Champions of Change, Fiske, 1999). An analysis of data from the National Educational Longitudinal Survey, (NELS) which looked at the results of 25,000 students over a ten year span, was profound:

‘Students with high involvement in the arts, including minority and low income students, performed better in school and stayed in school longer than students with low involvement, the relative involvement increasing over the school years. Low-income students involved in band and orchestra outscores others on the NELS math assessment; low income students involved in drama showed greater reading proficiency and more positive self-concept compared to those with little or no involvement’.

3.41 Follow-up research published by the Arts Education Partnership (Critical Links: Learning in the Arts and Student Academic and Social Development, Deasy, 2002) reported on sixty-two separate research studies:

‘...many of which found transfer of skills from the arts (visual arts, dance, drama, music, multi-arts) to learning in other subject areas’.

3.42 The Report by the President’s Committee on the Arts and Humanities also identifies recent research in the area of arts education and neuro-science, ‘in particular... the complex ways that certain types of arts experiences effect cognitive development’. Findings include:

‘Music training is closely correlated with development of phonological awareness - one of the most important predictors of early reading skills. Children who were motivated to practice a specific art form developed improved attention and also improved general intelligence. Training of attention and focus leads to improvement in other cognitive domains’.
4.0 A VISION FOR CULTURAL EDUCATION

4.1 There remains a great deal of patchiness in provision of Cultural Education across England. In some places, it is truly excellent with a well-honed partnership of schools, nationally funded organisations, enlightened local authority investment, charities and voluntary organisations coming together to give children great opportunities. In other areas, there is a real dearth of provision. This needs to be addressed by making improvements to those under-performing areas to bring standards up to a universally high level across England.

4.2 Key factors in making improvements in the provision of Cultural Education include:

- A clear signal from the coalition government of its belief in the importance of Cultural Education in the lives of children and young people.

- A single unifying strategy with all public funding streams working together.

- Stronger partnerships between providers both in-school and out-of-school and from the formal and informal sectors.

- A more rigorous quality framework so that all providers have a clear understanding of what excellent provision looks like.

- Better training of those involved in delivering Cultural Education both in-school and out-of-school.

- Clearer sign posting for children and young people and for their teachers, parents and carers about what is available to them on both a local and national level.
WHAT CULTURAL EDUCATION SHOULD A CHILD RECEIVE?

Recommendation 1: Broad Cultural Education for all children

There should be a minimum level of Cultural Education that a child should expect to receive during his or her schooling as a whole. For children to leave full-time education without having engaged in the spectrum of Cultural Education outlined below would be a failure of a system which sets out to create young people who are not only academically able, but also have a fully-rounded appreciation of the world around them.

4.3 By the time a child is seven years old, they should have:

- Regularly taken part in different cultural activities, such as reading books and story-telling, arts and crafts, making short animations, singing, music-making and dance.

- They should also have been given the opportunity to visit age appropriate events and venues, such as a theatre, cinema, concert hall, museum, gallery, library or heritage site.

4.4 In her independent report for the government, The Early Years: Foundations for life, health and learning, which was published in 2011, Dame Clare Tickell clearly lays out a rationale for delivering Cultural Education to the very youngest children:

‘Alongside the three prime areas of personal, social and emotional development, communication and language and physical development, I propose four specific areas in which the prime skills are applied: literacy, mathematics, expressive arts and design, and understanding the world. Practitioners working with the youngest children should focus on the prime areas, but also recognise that the foundations of all areas of learning are laid from birth – for example literacy in the very early sharing of books, and mathematics through early experiences of quantity and spatial relationships. Any focus on the prime areas will be complemented and reinforced by learning in the specific areas, for example expressive arts is a key route through which children develop language and physical skills’.
By the time a child is eleven years old, they should have enjoyed a high quality curriculum offer which includes:

- The opportunity to gain knowledge about Cultural Education subjects and also to explore their own creativity.

- The chance to create, to design, to devise, to compose and to choreograph their own work in collaboration with their classmates.

- The experience of creating work by themselves, such as writing a story, poem or play text.

- Presenting, displaying and performing to a range of audiences.

- Using arts-specific vocabulary to respond to, evaluate, explain, analyse, question and critique their own and other people’s artistic works.

- Learning about the application of the latest technology to help them to access culture.

In addition, they will have:

- Been encouraged to be adventurous in their choices about cultural activities, by learning about literature, films, visual arts, crafts, heritage, music and dance that is beyond the scope of their normal everyday engagement.

- Learned about the people who have created or are creating art forms. They will also have gained knowledge about the historical development of those art forms.

- Had the chance to learn a musical instrument.

- Regularly taken part in singing.

- Taken part in dramatic performances.

- Taken part in workshops with professional artists, craftsmen, architects, musicians, archivists, curators, dancers, film-makers, poets, authors or actors.

- Been on visits at each Key Stage to cultural institutions and venues, which might include a museum, a theatre, a gallery, a heritage site and a cinema.

- Become a regular user of a library.

- Regularly read books for pleasure, rather than only as part of their schoolwork.

- Been encouraged to use digital technology as a means of accessing and gaining a deeper understanding of great culture.

- Taken part in the making (writing, acting, shooting, editing) of a short film.

- Had the opportunity to gain a qualification through the Junior Arts Award.

- Received the support necessary to take an interest or passion further.

- Been made aware of the other activities and resources available to them in their local area.

- Been able to join a lunchtime or after school club to continue their interests.

4.7 By the time a child is sixteen years old, they should have continued to have enjoyed a high quality and enriching curriculum offer through Key Stage 3, including Art, Dance, Drama, Design, History, Literature and Music.

4.8 They should also have:

- Been given the opportunity to study Cultural Education subjects to gain qualifications at Level 2.

- Continued their journey of cultural discovery by being encouraged to make adventurous choices about the cultural activities they enjoy.

- Developed knowledge about a range of different aspects of culture, including an understanding of historical development and context of Art, Drama, Design, Literature and Music.

- Developed an understanding of the different forms of each cultural area (for example: literature includes poetry, play texts, short stories and novels; music genres include classical, pop, hip hop, rock, jazz, folk, musical theatre and world).

- Been on regular visits to a museum, heritage site, gallery and cinema at each key stage.

- Sung in the school choir.

- Attended professional concerts and plays.

- Taken part in an artistic performance.

- Watched and learned about films from outside of the mainstream 'Hollywood blockbusters', with a specific emphasis on British film.

- Read a broad range of books both by living authors and by authors who may no longer be alive, but whose books are regarded as literary classics. Some of these books might be about subjects that are directly relevant to the readers' lives today, but young people should also be reading books that expand horizons and show them the possibilities in the world beyond their own direct experiences.

- Continued to use a library to access a wide range of books, as well as for other research materials.

- Regularly made use of digital technology to see, read and listen to great culture, no matter where it is situated in the world.

- Had their artistic and creative work celebrated in school and in their wider local community through publication, exhibitions, performance and screenings.

- Had the opportunity to achieve their Arts Award Gold, supporting progression to further and higher education and employment.
• Been supported to take particular talents and interests forward.

• Had a chance to learn about careers in the Creative and Cultural Industries and been supported to find work experience in these areas, should they wish to pursue it.

• Had the chance to lead or shape activity in school by helping with a club, acting as an ‘arts mentor’ or helping in the school library.

• Been able to join a lunchtime or after school club in areas such as creative writing, dance, drama, art, music, film or digital media.

4.9 By the time a young person leaves school at the age of eighteen or nineteen years old they should additionally have:

• Been given the opportunity to study Cultural Education subjects to gain qualifications at Level 3.

• Been made aware of Apprenticeships offered by Creative & Cultural Skills (the Sector Skills Council for Craft, Cultural Heritage, Design, Literature, Music, Performing and Visual Arts) and Skillset (the Sector Skills Council for TV, film, radio, interactive media, animation, computer games, facilities, photo imaging, publishing, advertising and fashion and textiles).

• Had the opportunity to spend time interacting with cultural professionals (such as artists, writers, archivists, musicians, curators, technicians, film-makers, designers and dancers).

• Learned about the wider world of employment opportunities within the Creative and Cultural Industries, aside from only being a frontline performer or ‘big name’ creative practitioner.

• Been encouraged to continue to sample a wide range of adventurous cultural experiences during their own leisure time.

• Been encouraged to continue to take part in the broad range of cultural events that take place both within their school environment and in the wider area in which they live.
- Developed the ability to build on the knowledge, which they have acquired about Culture, to be able to discuss and critique the new cultural works that they encounter.

- Had their own personal achievements in cultural activities celebrated in school or in their wider local community.

4.10 The adoption of these minimum levels of expectation across the education system in England would result in a generation of culturally aware and culturally literate young people moving into adulthood with a genuine understanding of culture and the ability to make informed critical decisions about the cultural activities in which they engage later in their lives. I would encourage parents and carers to engage with their children’s schools in making demands in relation to minimum expectations of delivery in this area.
5.0 A NEW STRATEGY

5.1 At present, the role of over-seeing the cultural education of children and young people is performed by a number of different bodies funded either directly through the Department for Education or via the Department for Culture, Media and Sport, the National Lottery, Local Authorities, charitable bodies, or directly through schools.

Recommendation 2: Cross-departmental government co-operation

A new cross-Whitehall ministerial group on Cultural Education should be set up, under the chairmanship of the Culture Minister or an Education Minister.

5.2 One of the great challenges for Cultural Education remains that government responsibility for this area is split across a number of different departments. As well as the Department for Education and the Department for Culture Media and Sport, the Cabinet Office, the Department for Business, Innovation and Skills, the Ministry of Justice, the Department of Health and the Department for Communities and Local Government also have oversight of some aspects of this area. Given the close relationship that Cultural Education also has in helping to drive forward the government’s Big Society and Wellbeing agendas and its importance as a driver of economic growth for the Creative and Cultural Industries both nationally and internationally, it is vital that government departments join together to ensure that programmes and projects achieve their maximum potential.

Recommendation 3: A New National Plan

There is currently no over-arching strategy for the commissioning and delivery of Cultural Education in England. The government should develop a single National Cultural Education Plan. This document should set out its ambitions for children and young people in this area, while ensuring the development of a framework that enables these ambitions to be delivered.

5.3 Firmly based on the Vision for Cultural Education set out in Chapter 4 of this Review – and with reference to the other Recommendations and supporting text in this document – the National Cultural Education Plan should set out a clear pathway from Early Years Provision for all children, through to those young people who study Cultural Education subjects at the highest level. The Plan should include in-school and out-of-school opportunities offered by the full range of providers. The Plan should also include details of provision for children with Special Educational Needs and Disabilities, as well as for Looked After Children. It should consider the requirements of children of all races and both genders. The Plan should be clear in outlining the minimum requirements and expectations placed on the schools and organisations involved. It should also ensure that there is full accountability for the spending of public funds and that any duplication of resources is removed.

5.4 It is essential that the National Cultural Education Plan clearly sets out how the quality of Cultural Education provision can be assured and assessed across the board. There are many different providers and types of Cultural Education and it is of the utmost importance that children and parents know that they are receiving provision of the highest quality.

Recommendation 4: Arms-length Bodies working together as a partnership

Arts Council England, the Heritage Lottery Fund, the British Film Institute, the Big Lottery Fund and English Heritage should work together to ensure that their individual strategies/plans in the area of Cultural Education cohere in a way that adds up to a single over-arching strategy in line with the government’s stated ambitions. By coming together as a new Cultural Education Partnership Group, this could ultimately result in a single strategic commissioning fund for Cultural Education money in England.

5.5 The Lottery Distributors operate at arms-length from the government and it is important to underline at this point that I am not suggesting that this independence should be diluted in any way. However, there would be clear benefits in the Lottery Distributors working more closely together in developing a coherent, high level strategy, while at the same time retaining individual organisations’ strategic priorities. Currently, there is no overall strategy for spending National Lottery money on Cultural Education activities. This weakness creates the potential for over-supply in some geographical areas and under-supply in others.

5.6 It would also be logical for other non-departmental public bodies, such as the National Museums and English Heritage to be involved in this group, alongside independent organisations such as NESTA. It would seem sensible for one of the Cultural Lottery Distributors to play a lead role in co-ordinating work across the various bodies.

5.7 This new Cultural Education Partnership Group (CEPG) could perform four clear functions:

1. Through the delivery of the CEPG’s own strategy, this partnership group would help government to deliver aspects of the National Cultural Education Plan in England, in line with the priorities of the constituent organisations which together make up the CEPG. This would happen through projects in schools, through nationally and locally funded cultural organisations, through the Creative and Cultural Industries and through voluntary groups.

2. Acting as a single ‘front door’ for the funding for Cultural Education that is distributed by Arts Council England, the British Film Institute, the Heritage Lottery Fund and the Big Lottery Fund, ensuring that for the first time this money is distributed across the Cultural Education sector as a whole. Rather than being itself a new organisation, it is envisaged that the CEPG would be a new way of organising funding to ensure that it is invested in the most effective way possible. To be categorically clear, I am not advocating the creation of a new standalone Non Departmental Public Body to fulfil this role.

3. To ensure that a locally delivered brokering service is provided to schools, teachers, parents and pupils to enable them more easily to gain access to the wide range of excellent Cultural Education services provided by organisations in their local area. This could be achieved through the further development of Arts Council England’s Bridge Organisations, which currently focus on the arts, to include other cultural areas.

4. To work with Ofsted to develop a common framework for quality assurance across all cultural forms, based on shared data gathering, which would allow for evidence and evaluation across all cultural forms.

5.8 The constituent organisations which together make up the CEPG would have a strategic commissioning remit running across all of the performing arts (music, dance and theatre), the visual arts, literature and poetry, craft, film, heritage, museums and galleries. To be clear, it would specifically not be a delivery organisation, but would instead fund projects put forward by schools, cultural organisations and voluntary groups. For the first time, the Lottery money would be invested in Cultural Education as a coherent whole, rather than on a rather more piecemeal basis. The CEPG would have an overall co-ordination role, as it would be uniquely placed in knowing exactly what is going on across the country. This would have the benefit of co-ordinating the plethora of different initiatives at national and local level, allowing a far more joined up overall strategy to be developed, where one currently does not exist at all.

5.9 In addition to receiving funding from the Lottery distributors, the CEPG should be set up in a way that allows it to receive donations from philanthropists and sponsorship from industry. Projects which work with children and young people remain very attractive both to businesses and philanthropists and the CEPG should be encouraged to work closely with these two groups, in line with the government’s current strategy for developing wider philanthropic giving. There are a number of excellent Cultural Education programmes, which are currently operated by private sector organisations from within the Creative and Cultural Industries. These programmes would operate to the greatest effect if they are closely aligned to other programmes funded through the CEPG.

FOR CONSIDERATION BY THE CULTURAL EDUCATION PARTNERSHIP GROUP

5.10 There are some clear structural gaps in the way in which Cultural Education in England currently operates, which should be addressed by the CEPG, with reference to the National Cultural Education Plan. The following recommendations would help to address these deficiencies.

Recommendation 5: A Cultural Education Passport

The CEPG should consider establishing a new Cultural Education Passport scheme for children between the ages of five and nineteen, which records all of their in-school and out of school cultural activities, enabling parents, carers and teachers to understand what each child has achieved and to plug any gaps in knowledge and experience. This would be particularly useful during the transition between primary and secondary schools, where Year 7 pupils may enter a secondary school from a variety of different feeder primaries, each of which has a slightly different programme of Cultural Education.

5.11 Leeds City Council’s Breeze Card is an excellent example of how such a scheme might work. The Breeze Card offers young people discounts on a range of services, acts as a Library Card and enables cultural organisations to connect with under eighteens. It also allows for data collection on the cultural experiences enjoyed by young people. The CEPG might wish to commission a national scheme, which would provide local authorities with a tool-kit to use in their own areas. For prudent economic reasons, it would seem sensible to create a single scheme, which can then be adopted locally, rather than every local area incurring development costs to build their own scheme. There are also versions of a passport scheme, which operate on a more localised in-school basis. During the evidence sessions for this Review, I was impressed to hear of a cultural passport scheme used at South Wirral High School, which might well be able to be further developed for use more widely.

Recommendation 6: A Cultural Education Website

A single destination website should be created, bringing all Cultural Education resources together in one easily accessible place online.

5.12 There is a need for a coherent, over-arching digital strategy for Cultural Education to support teachers, commissioners, practitioners and children and young people. This should encompass content development, distribution and signposting. Arts Council England and NESTA might well wish to consider the further development of their existing partnership in this area, bringing in other partner organisations with expertise in specific areas. It is important that the strategy brings together both in-school and out-of-school activities.

5.13 Ideally, there should be one website containing information for teachers and families, as a single point of reference across the whole of Cultural Education, detailing what is available in each local area. This should be built on a standard taxonomy and web architecture used across all areas of Cultural Education, to enable cultural organisations to link together better online. Culture 24 has pioneered some excellent work in this area, not only for the museums and galleries sector, but also for the historic and built environment. This could be widened out across all of the areas within the remit of this Review. It might well be possible to develop this service in partnership with an online search engine. As with the Cultural Education Passport, this could be developed nationally with one single build cost and then made available for use locally, without further development costs being incurred.

5.14 As part of its plan for the use of digital technology in Cultural Education, the CEPG should consider helping schools to make use of existing national archives and resources (for example: film, portraits, heritage, the government art collection). This is a rich resource needing a central organisation to help to promote their use. Many publicly funded cultural organisations such as The National Theatre and the Royal Opera House are now producing extremely high quality cinema showings of live performances. Many book publishers are also producing streamed presentations from leading children’s authors. The CEPG should examine ways in which these performances can be used in more schools than at present - particularly in geographical regions from where it is difficult to travel to major cultural venues. The initiative could also be further widened to include other areas of Cultural Education. It is important to ensure that teachers are aware of the opportunities available to them through new digital technology. This can be achieved through the provision of relevant and up-to-date continuous professional development.

5.15 With the rapid growth of new digital distribution technology and the ease of access to digital media for children and young people, it is important that new innovative digital models of content distribution are quickly embraced by the Cultural Education world, at the point at which these models begin to gain traction. Otherwise, this sector could risk alienating itself from younger generations, simply by being behind the curve in terms of technological development. The growth of ever faster broadband in most parts of England remains a huge opportunity for the delivery of high quality Cultural Education into every home and school in the country.

5.16 There are completely separate, secondary benefits of building a comprehensive database of Cultural Education activities. Currently, there are a large number of organisations from the charity sector, which undertake work in schools across the whole range of Cultural Education activities. They could be encouraged to register on the site using a standard registration form. Over time, this would enable an overview to be built up of the number of charities working in this field, and the type of work being done, with a view of encouraging greater coordination between organisations to provide a more effective offer. Work to encourage charities to register could be undertaken with the Charity Commission.

FURTHER AREAS FOR CONSIDERATION

5.17 During the extensive written and verbal submissions made to this Review, I heard many examples of excellent practice, alongside some first rate ideas for how Cultural Education in England might be improved. Not all of these ideas naturally fit within any of the other sections of my Review, so I have gathered them together in one place here.

5.18 As part of the implementation of the National Cultural Education Plan, the Department for Education, the Department for Culture, Media and Sport and the Cultural Education Partnership Group should consider whether we are using the entire publicly funded Cultural Education infrastructure in the best way possible. For example the Sorrell Foundation’s National Art and Design Saturday Club, runs classes for schoolchildren at their local colleges and universities at a time of the week when their specialist equipment is laying unused. This type of project could be developed into a bigger programme across the country and rolled out into other areas of Cultural Education to incorporate activities into venues’ and institutions’ downtime.
5.19 The CEPG should support efforts by cultural organisations to make their offer more attractive to children and families. The work undertaken by Kids in Museums, in terms of identifying the barriers to enjoying cultural experiences from a consumer perspective, is a good example of what can be achieved on a relatively modest budget.

5.20 Too much research on the effectiveness of education projects across the cultural sector is based on time frames that are completely arbitrary, save for the fact that they fit in with public sector spending settlements. We need to see more long-term research to fully understand what does and does not work. To this end, the Department for Education, the Department for Culture, Media and Sport and the Cultural Education Partnership Group should consider the commissioning of a long-term study of the effect of Cultural Education on young people’s lives alongside the impact that Cultural Education has on our society and economy as a whole. I note that the National Education Longitudinal Survey cited in the President’s Committee on the Arts and Humanities report Reinvesting in Arts Education: Winning America’s Future Through Creative Schools is based on a ten year study of 25,000 students.

5.21 During the course of gathering evidence for this review, I have heard about many different examples of outstanding education work provided by cultural organisations, both inside and outside of the classroom. I was particularly impressed by the Museums and Galleries sector, with many national and local organisations from this area firmly planting education at the centre of their activities. The spirit of collaboration between national and regional museums, fostered by the Department for Education and the Department for Culture, Media and Sport’s Strategic Commissioning Scheme, has enabled special loans of outstanding art and objects and the sharing of nationally held expertise to smaller museums around the country. This has enabled children and young people, who might otherwise have never encountered these great artifacts, pictures or scientific samples, to have their learning enriched by seeing these objects for themselves. This is an excellent example of the dissemination of the highest level of academic learning to the widest possible constituency. I would welcome the continuation of funding by the Department for Education and the Department for Culture, Media and Sport for this sort of work by museums and galleries, with particular attention being paid to ensuring that children from more disadvantaged backgrounds benefit fully from the financial investment.

5.22 Education work is included as a condition of many of the funding agreements/contracts for funded organisations/projects of bodies such as Arts Council England, the British Film Institute, the Heritage Lottery Fund and English Heritage. Funders should be encouraged to be rigorous in ensuring that these funded organisations continue to meet their obligations in this regard throughout the period for which they are funded. Again, the criteria for this should be based on the quality framework commissioned by the CEPG.
5.23 The government commissioned the Rt Hon Lord Smith of Finsbury to lead a review into Film Policy, which was published earlier in 2012. It includes specific reference to film education as well as the importance of supporting pro-copyright messages across cultural education initiatives for all sectors. Lord Smith and his panel worked collaboratively with the British Film Institute across the review. With its newly enlarged remit, the British Film Institute is best placed to build on the work done in formal and in informal film education in recent years. Alongside the recommendations already made by Lord Smith in this specific area, I would encourage the British Film Institute to be bold in bringing these film activities together into a joined-up coherent film education offer.
6.0 LOCAL CULTURAL EDUCATION PARTNERSHIPS

Recommendation 7: New Local Partnerships

In my Review of Music Education, I stressed the importance of partnerships between classroom teachers, specialist music teachers and professional musicians in the delivery of a truly excellent Music Education to young people. To this end, I recommended the creation of a series of Local Music Education Hubs through which funding would be channeled. The government agreed with the recommendation in its response to my Review and the National Plan for Music Education has detailed how these Hubs will operate. Consideration should now be given to rolling a structure out across the rest of the Cultural Education spectrum, to enable meaningful partnerships on the ground across different art forms and using all of the expertise and venues that are available in a given area. This could be achieved through the further development of Arts Council England’s Bridge Organisations, which currently focus on the arts, to include other cultural areas.

6.1 The Department for Culture, Media and Sport and the Department for Education should identify the exact model for the delivery of Local Cultural Education Partnerships, as part of the development of the National Plan for Cultural Education, although it would seem sensible to begin by ascertaining whether the Local Music Education Hubs might be widened out to include the rest of Cultural Education. It is important that if this does become the favoured option that the result is in no way detrimental to the delivery of Music Education. To be clear, I am not recommending this route as the only available option, rather, I am suggesting the government examines it as one of a number of ways forward.

6.2 In many local areas across England, there remains a good deal of duplication of resources between different cultural organisations and venues. The development of Local Cultural Education partnerships would allow for economies of scale and joint operations between different organisations providing Cultural Education services. This means that the potential would increase for a greater amount of public money to be spent on delivering Cultural Education directly to children and young people, rather than on administrative costs.
6.3 It is important that Local Culture Education Partnerships help to ‘close the gap’ between those children and young people who come from families who are more likely to access cultural provision and those children who come from backgrounds that mean that they find it more challenging to make cultural activities and learning a part of their everyday lives. Where Local Cultural Education Partnerships operate the most effectively, they would identify and respond to proven need, rather than simply concentrating on creating a structure for supplying existing provision.

6.4 The role of Local Authority funded Library Services in the delivery of Local Cultural Education Partnerships should not be underestimated. Library Services are already embedded into their local communities and often link communities, schools and cultural organisations. People, who do not otherwise connect with cultural organisations, trust them; and they tend not to be seen as being elitist. As well as having a direct input into the Literature strand of Cultural Education, Libraries are also excellent repositories of information about services available to young people in any given area and also have the technology available to enable young people to register on a database (through their library cards), which could be used to support other digitally-led programmes, such as the Cultural Education Passport.

6.5 I suspect that many people reading this Review from outside the schools sector may well be surprised to learn that school libraries are not a statutory requirement. Despite there being no regulatory requirement to do so, I would strongly urge all schools to find ways of creating libraries within their school buildings. It would seem to me that the first step towards raising standards of literacy is to ensure that those children, who are less likely to read, have a ready access to a well-curated selection of suitable books. This might well be an area that would gain from additional funding from corporate or individual philanthropists, on either a local or national level.

6.6 I have been particularly impressed by the development of the Campus model based on a group of independent cultural organisations located in a close geographical proximity joining together in a single vision for their education activities. This ‘Alliance for Creative Excellence’ has been adopted by The Barbican Centre, the Guildhall School of Music and Drama, the London Symphony Orchestra and the Centre for Young Musicians. These separate organisations work together as one in the delivery of their education activities to form one of the country’s most developed models of a ‘Community of Practice’. I particularly welcome the meaningful involvement of a Higher Education establishment in the partnership based at The Barbican Centre. It is also exciting to note that there are now plans to further develop the model to include drama, technical theatre, dance, spoken word, film and visual art. This far-sighted partnership is a model that would benefit from close examination by other cultural and education organisations - particularly those that are located on the same or adjoining sites and working across similar art forms. It is worth pointing out that historical precedent among organisations, which have chosen not to work closely together in the past, should never be a reason for failing to work closely together today. This idea should not just be limited to the performing arts either. In literature, for example, there would be a huge benefit if clusters of organisations that develop writing skills and talent (such as theatres, writing agencies, festivals, publishers and higher education institutions) could work together to provide an exciting local writing offer for schools and young people.

6.7 I would encourage organisations, which are considering the development of Local Cultural Education Partnerships, to examine engaging with, or creating, community foundations. These organisations are committed to positive social change through the development of ‘community philanthropy’. The Community Foundation Network is the registered charity that leads this movement. It describes community philanthropy as ‘involving people from all parts of a community working together locally to use all the resources available to them to improve everyone’s life’. Much of the organisational learning in this area could have a direct relevance to the development of Local Cultural Education Partnerships.

6.8 When schools develop their curriculum, they should be encouraged to build partnerships with local Cultural Education resources. Culture is important in helping young people to form a sense of place, so schools should be encouraged fully to make use of the cultural assets that are geographically close to them. There is a good deal of excellent work in this area that is being delivered by both English Heritage and Engaging Places, focusing on the importance of architecture, the built environment and places of historical significance in a local area.
The new network of Bridge Organisations set up by Arts Council England, which begins operation in April 2012, has been tasked with establishing clusters or networks of schools linked to National Portfolio Organisations, museums and libraries. I welcome this development and look forward to seeing positive outcomes from this new programme.

Headteachers have an increasingly important role to play in the commissioning of cultural organisations to work in partnership with their schools. More needs to be done by cultural organisations to build closer relationships directly with headteachers, so that dialogues can be opened and maintained. More and more, cultural organisations regard engagement with potential sponsors from the business community in their local area, as part of their everyday job. However, they do not always recognise the importance of headteachers in terms of building relationships that could deliver incremental revenue streams for their organisations.

Cultural organisations should not be expected to replace formal Cultural Education in schools. Arts educators should exist to augment and broaden the work of classroom teachers, rather than as a replacement. A visit to a museum or gallery should not be viewed as a replacement for classroom based learning (nor merely as an outing at the end of term). In the same way, visits from musicians or writers should form only part of a young person’s learning, alongside the valuable work of their classroom teacher.

Recommendation 8: Managing Closer Partnerships

More can be done - both by cultural organisations and by schools - to foster closer working partnerships. Each primary and secondary school should nominate a member of the Senior Management Team to act as a Cultural Education Champion. All schools should also have a member of the governing body who has a particular responsibility for and interest in cultural education. This would increase with the recruitment of a greater number of school governors from among the Creative and Cultural Industries. This position should be mirrored in cultural organisations, which should themselves be encouraged to appoint a trustee with particular responsibility for and interest in education. One method for building closer ties would be for each school in England to be adopted by a cultural organisation to build meaningful long-term bonds between the two entities.
7.0 CULTURAL EDUCATION IN THE CURRICULUM

7.1 There is a good deal of concern expressed in much of the evidence that I have received during the course of undertaking this Review about the extent to which the coalition government values Cultural Education in schools. The introduction of the English Baccalaureate is a significant contributory factor in causing these concerns. There is no suggestion in this Review that the learning of Cultural Education subjects should be placed above the need for every single child to become proficient in reading, writing and mathematics. Indeed, there is wide acknowledgement that any education system, which allows a child to leave school without having achieved this goal, has failed.

7.2 As part of the publication of the National Cultural Education Plan, the government should underline the importance it places on Cultural Education subjects within the school curriculum, recognising the value of gaining qualifications in these subjects at GCSE and beyond.

7.3 If we are to create a generation of fully rounded individuals, then the government should consider whether an education in at least one cultural subject (aside from English literature and history) to at least GCSE level should be mandatory. This could be achieved through the creation of a sixth grouping of subjects included in the English Baccalaureate. This would include Cultural Education subjects such as art and design, dance, drama, design technology, film studies and music. I would encourage the government to consider this idea when it next reviews the content of the English Baccalaureate.

7.4 A clear signal from the coalition government that Cultural Education subjects, aside from English literature and history, form an important part of the curriculum, would provide a much needed boost. It would also send out a clear message to those schools that are concentrating their financial investment into the subject areas upon which they perceive they are being judged to the exclusion of all others. At this stage, it is important to make clear that there has been no central instruction from the Department for Education to make this happen. Headteachers and governing bodies are increasingly able to make choices about how their available funds are to be spent. This means that at a school-by-school level, headteachers and governors are able to continue to support Cultural Education subjects as part of their school curriculum, if they choose to do so. I would strongly encourage them to continue to make these subjects a priority within their schools. I would also encourage parents and carers who themselves understand the value of Cultural Education subjects to communicate this to headteachers and governing bodies.

7.5 Any absence of Cultural Education subjects from the National Curriculum, following the review which is currently being undertaken, runs the risk of a general devaluing of these subjects within schools, with a consequent removal. of financial investment in the teaching of these subjects. It is true that a school will have the opportunity to choose to include Cultural Education subjects in its own curriculum, although there remains a risk that these subjects will not be made available to pupils in every school, as investment could be channeled into delivering non-Cultural Education subjects in some schools. It should be noted that inclusion of Cultural Education subjects in the National Curriculum should not be seen as an end in itself. Statutory provision is not enough: it is the quality of the teaching that really counts.

7.6 The National Curriculum review is still ongoing at the time of writing, but I note that the very positive news that the expert panel recommendations published in December 2011, suggest that art & design and music should be Foundation subjects of the National Curriculum at Key Stages 1 to 3.

7.7 Further, in a very welcome development, the panel has recommended that ‘the arts’ should be made compulsory at Key Stage 4. Their report states:

‘Bearing in mind the influence that the EBacc is having on the provision of academic courses in Key Stage 4 for a larger proportion of pupils, we are concerned, as in primary education, that the role of art and music in a broad, balanced and effective education should not be lost.

‘Apart from the intrinsic worth of including art and music in the statutory curriculum from 5 to 16 because of the importance of pupils acquiring knowledge of their cultural heritage(s), there is now substantial evidence that a good art and music education benefits individuals, their communities and the nation as a whole in other ways… In addition to these educational outcomes for pupils, consideration needs to be given to the importance of creative subjects to the economic health of the nation’.

7.8 Cultural Education areas such as (but not limited to) design, literature, film and heritage can directly impact on the learning of subjects that fall within the English Baccalaureate (such as Science, English and History) and more needs to be done to ensure that this is fully understood by the organisations providing cultural learning. Curriculum links are important and cultural organisations should ensure that their in-school programmes deliver meaningful learning outcomes for the pupils involved. Funding organisations should consider how best they can ensure that this happens through their funding agreements, or when they make grants. Working through the Cultural Education Partnership Group, particular attention should be paid to ensuring that overlaps in provision are minimised and that there are no pockets of Cultural Education deprivation.

7.9 It is important that schools and the cultural organisations working with schools have a meaningful two-way dialogue. The cultural organisations need to ensure that the programmes and activities they provide are fulfilling the requirements identified by the schools; the schools themselves need to articulate their requirements clearly to the cultural organisations. Quality, standards and learning outcomes should be the watchwords for all cultural organisations’ engagement with schools.

7.10 I was impressed to hear that the Clore Duffield Foundation places great store on the positioning of the senior education manager within the organisational structure of funding applicants. There is an expectation that the Head of Education/Director of Education will operate in the top senior management tier, rather than at a more junior level in the organisation. This provides a very useful snapshot of the relative importance of Education within an organisation. It might well be a useful tool for other funding bodies to adopt this approach.

Recommendation 9: Design in the Curriculum

Greater priority should be given to the importance of Design as a curriculum subject within schools.

7.11 The government has prioritised Science, Technology, Engineering and Mathematics (known as STEM subjects). Design should be included on this list. There is a strongly held view among design professionals that we compare unfavourably with rapidly developing economies such as China. The perception seems to have arisen in England that Design should be regarded as a second tier subject. Experienced designers such as Sir John Sorrell and Sir James Dyson have argued passionately that this perception is wrong and that our design-based engineering and creative industries will face very real recruitment problems in the short-to-medium term unless this issue is resolved. I would encourage the government to take swift action to deal with this worrying issue as part of its response to this Review, as it ties directly into the current drive to help foster economic growth.

7.12 When the Art and Design and the Design and Technology curriculums are reviewed, it is to be hoped that any new standards should ensure that pupils are taught the necessary skills required by industry. There is a strong desire from industry to see a greater emphasis on the practical application of mathematics and science within the subject, while at the same time not losing its connection to art. The value of drawing and visualisation within design disciplines, including architecture and product design, should not be lost.

7.13 There are parallels to be drawn here with the recent review authored by Ian Livingstone and Alex Hope for NESTA into the video games and visual effects industries. Their report says that ‘there are severe misalignments between the education system and what the UK video games and visual effects industries need’. They go on to argue that there should be greater crossover between art and science within education, with the current structure based on the 19th century faculty system. They also note that this separation is not in existence in fast developing economies, such as Singapore. I am hopeful that the curriculum review, which is currently being undertaken, will find ways to address this issue given the speedy advance of technological innovation since the publication of the last National Curriculum.

7.14 The findings of the Livingstone-Hope Review were echoed by Eric Schmidt, the Executive Chair of Google, when he gave the MacTaggart Lecture in 2011:

“Over the past century, the UK has stopped nurturing its polymaths. You need to bring art and science back together ... Lewis Carroll didn’t just write one of the classic fairytales of all time. He was also a mathematics tutor at Oxford. James Clerk Maxwell was described by Einstein as among the best physicists since Newton – but was also a published poet.”

Recommendation 10: Dance and Drama in Schools

Consideration should be given to promoting Dance and Drama to subject areas in their own right, rather than being seen as junior partners to P.E. and English.

7.15 I am concerned that Dance and Drama remain ‘Cinderella’ subjects within schools. For Dance, its inclusion as an adjunct to P.E. - rather than it being regarded as a fully-fledged subject in its own right - does not help this situation. Given recent moves to refocus the importance of competitive sports, I would suggest that now may be the time to consider moving Dance out of P.E. departments and into a Performing Arts subject grouping. Drama suffers similar challenges in the way in which it is regarded as a subsidiary subject to English. The same consideration should be given to allowing it to stand alone as a subject.

Recommendation 11: The Arts Award

Most children and young people should be encouraged to take part in the Arts Award and Junior Arts Award, which should be regarded as a valuable qualification.

7.16 The Arts Award developed by Arts Council England and accredited by Trinity College London supports young people to develop as artists and arts leaders in areas such as the performing arts, visual arts, literature, media and multimedia. This award, which is made at Bronze, Silver and Gold levels, is aimed at young people aged eleven and above. The evidence which I have seen while undertaking this Review suggests that it is both a valuable and valued qualification and greater efforts to involve more children in the Award would be a positive step forward. I also note the development of a Junior Arts Award for children aged seven and above. This is an excellent move, which should be widely welcomed. I believe that the further development of an Arts Award for children, who are aged younger than seven years old, is also worthy of consideration. Both the Arts Award and the Junior Arts Award would be important contributors to the Cultural Education Passport suggested earlier. Their scope should be increased to include all the areas of Cultural Education covered by this Review.

7.17 So far, more than 60,000 young people have gained an Arts Award since the programme’s launch, with the Gold Award now carrying 35 UCAS points, allowing meaningful recognition by Higher Education institutions. [Source: Arts Award Annual review 2010-2011]. Between 2008 and 2011 an Access Fund supported by Arts Council England made small grants, which supported young people in experiencing professional arts practice. Those from more disadvantaged backgrounds were given priority for this funding. This particular fund is now in need of a new benefactor; this would be an extremely worthwhile project for a cultural philanthropist to consider taking on.

Recommendation 12: Artsmark

The scope of the Artsmark Award should be widened to include all areas of cultural education covered by this Review.

7.18 The Artsmark Award has recently been reformatted by Arts Council England, in consultation with Ofsted. This national award aims to evaluate, celebrate and develop quality arts education. It covers Art and Design, Dance, Drama, Music and Creative Writing, with 20% of schools in England holding the award. It now focuses on the quantity, quality and impact of education work by cultural organisations. This is to be welcomed as a positive improvement. A further widening of the award to include the work of architecture centres, cinema and heritage institutions would be a logical next step for the award’s development. It should also encompass the creation of film and digital media.
RECOMMENDATIONS FOR OFSTED

7.19 The volume of education work undertaken by cultural organisations in schools is in no doubt. However, the quality of this work can be variable. In some cases it is innovative, inspiring and of an internationally high standard. In other cases, it can be found to be lacking. Cultural organisations and schools would benefit from clear advice from Ofsted as to the expectations placed upon them.

Recommendation 13: New guidance from Ofsted

Ofsted should be commissioned to create a guide to working with schools for cultural organisations. This would clearly and unambiguously set out the criteria, which Ofsted uses to judge whether learning is of a high standard. Classroom teachers are currently judged on these criteria and it seems both sensible and desirable for education professionals from the cultural sector to have their work assessed in the same way. The guide would also be of use to Headteachers who are making decisions about what to commission in their own schools.

7.20 As well as taking a more proactive approach to communicating a clear definition of excellent learning outcomes to cultural organisations and schools, Ofsted also has an important role to play in reporting on the quality and quantity of Cultural Education in schools. I hope that this will ensure that schools exceed the minimum expectations set out in Chapter 4 of this Review.

Recommendation 14: Cultural Education in Ofsted inspections

Ofsted should be encouraged to undertake a review of the standards across all Cultural Education subjects, rather than looking at them in standalone silos. The outcome of this Review would enable a more detailed understanding of the place of Cultural Education in schools in England today. Ofsted should also be encouraged to comment on each individual school’s Cultural Education provision as a specific part of their inspections. These comments would focus on the quantity and quality of cultural activities that take place within the school outside of lesson times, as well as within the school curriculum. It would also take note of the partnership links developed by the school with local cultural organisations.
8.0 THE WORKFORCE

8.1 The impact that great teachers and great teaching can have on a child’s engagement with Cultural Education should never be underestimated. Every day in schools across the country, life-changing moments happen for children because of the intervention of a dedicated teacher. It is vital that the schools have teachers who recognise the importance of Cultural Education within their schools and have the training, experience and tools to teach it to a high level.

8.2 The workforce that delivers Cultural Education both in and out of school also includes a significant number of cultural practitioners, who share their knowledge and enthusiasm for their area of expertise with children and young people. This takes place in formal and informal environments on both a paid for and voluntary basis. When delivered well, this community based activity is a valuable part of a child’s overall Cultural Education. It can be particularly effective in enabling young people to experience cultural activities that are beyond those which they would normally encounter in their school or home lives.

Recommendation 15: Connecting teachers to industry

A new scheme should be developed across the entire cultural sector to allow teachers to remain in touch with relevant professional developments outside of education. This scheme should include a mechanism for the further dissemination of this learning to other teachers in a local area. Teachers should be helped to build links with industry to ensure that their knowledge remains up-to-date. This could be through relationships with a local design company, theatre or higher education institution. Headteachers should consider whether this would be an effective use of Inset Days for teachers of Cultural Education subjects. Teachers themselves should be encouraged to continue with their artistic practice wherever possible. Many are themselves highly talented in their particular field (as artists, designers, writers, poets, actors, musicians, dancers etc.), but this can sometimes be forgotten. There should be a moment in each school year where this is celebrated either through a performance or exhibition.
8.3 I particularly welcome the launch of the James Dyson Foundation’s recent ‘DT Ambassadors’ initiative. This will recruit outstanding Design and Technology teachers into a programme, which will expose them to frontline industry, allowing them in turn to share their learning with other schools and teachers in their area. The government should consider investing in widening the scale of this excellent initiative, while at the same time investigating whether it could operate effectively in other areas of Cultural Education.

8.4 Schools should also consider the use of digital technology in helping teachers to remain connected to the latest innovations in industry. The use of video-conferencing and podcasting can be of particular benefit in rural areas, where teachers might find themselves located a long way from centres of excellence.

Recommendation 16: Training Teachers

Greater focus should be placed on demonstrating both to Newly Qualified Teachers and to experienced teachers the benefits and value of Cultural Education to children and young people. Working with the Cultural Education Partnership Group and the Department for Culture, Media and Sport, the Department for Education should consider commissioning the creation of a package of resources from which teachers of all levels of experience can draw across each art form. Schools should cluster to share expertise in particular areas to show off best practice to Newly Qualified Teachers and mentoring from more experienced teachers should be made available.

8.5 A primary school teacher will be expected to teach music, art and drama as part of the broad curriculum which they deliver to their pupils. They will receive just a few hours training in teaching these subjects during their Initial Teacher Training. For many teachers, these subjects fall outside of their comfort zone and they can lack confidence in delivering them. While I would encourage continued review of the component parts of PGCE courses, I do understand the challenges of fitting all of the necessary aspects of teacher training into a relatively short period of time. For this reason, I believe that more support should be given to Newly Qualified Teachers in this area. However, experienced teachers would also benefit from the availability of more wide-ranging Continuous Professional Development, allowing them to ensure that their skills in this area remain relevant and up-to-date.

8.6 There is a great opportunity for the new Teaching Schools to lead the way in delivering Continuous Professional Development for teachers of Cultural Education subjects. I would encourage publicly funded cultural and heritage organisations, as well as other members of the Creative and Cultural Industries, to work closely with Teaching Schools in the creation of specialist training programmes, which recognise and respond to the needs of teachers in this area, both at the very beginning of their careers and as they develop in the profession.

8.7 Headteachers remain an incredibly important force for ensuring that Cultural Education remains a thriving part of every school's life. During the course of this Review, I was greatly heartened to meet a large number of headteachers and to hear from a further significant group who took part in roundtable discussions. They all underlined the important role that they felt that Cultural Education played in each of their schools. As the next generation of Heads is trained, it is important to ensure that this understanding remains, particularly with an increase of responsibility for both curriculum and budgetary matters for Heads in Academy schools.

Recommendation 17: New qualifications for cultural practitioners

New qualifications aimed at cultural practitioners who also work in the education field should continue to be developed, as these qualifications professionalise and give greater recognition to this part of the workforce.

8.8 A postgraduate Diploma in Teaching and Learning has been pioneered by dance educators over the past few years. I recommended that it be further developed in the area of Music Education in my previous Review and I see no reason why it should not be widened out to include other areas of Cultural Education. This would allow professional writers, artists, film-makers, musicians, actors, craftsmen, curators, archivists and performers, who undertake education work alongside their main jobs, to receive professional recognition for being trained to deliver education work to a high standard. This would enable a practitioner to become a Qualified Creative Arts Educator, mirroring the Qualified Music Educator recommendation in my Music Education Review. I would also welcome the development of an intermediate Certificate in Teaching and Learning, which would provide a basic training for non-education professionals. Both the Certificate and Diploma could be awarded by different examining bodies, although they would act as a single recognised qualification.

8.9 I note with interest that Arts Council England has commissioned Creative & Cultural Skills to create a suite of nationally available, accredited vocational qualifications specifically for cultural practitioners working with children and young people. I look forward to learning more about the outcomes of this work.
8.10 It is important to stress that these courses do not replace the need for qualified and experienced classroom teachers. Instead, they help to professionalise the education work undertaken by cultural professionals alongside full-time classroom teachers.

Recommendation 18: Protecting Funding for the best professional training

The government should recognise the need for exceptional funding for culturally based conservatoires, which train the artists, actors, dancers and musicians who will create and perform the culture of the future. The funding settlements for these conservatoires should be secured for the long-term.

8.11 England contains some of the most admired Cultural Education training schools anywhere in the world, which are in receipt of exceptional funding because of the requirement for intense one-to-one tuition for students studying at these institutions. This group includes institutions as wide-ranging as: Bristol Old Vic Theatre School, Central School of Ballet, Central School of Speech and Drama, Circus Space, Courtauld Institute of Art, Guildhall School of Music and Drama, Leeds College of Music, London Academy of Music and Dramatic Art, London Contemporary Dance School, Liverpool Institute of Performing Arts, Northern School of Contemporary Dance, Rambert School of Ballet and Contemporary Dance, Rose Bruford College, Royal Academy of Music, Royal Academy of Dramatic Art, Royal College of Art, Royal College of Music, Royal Northern College of Music and Trinity Laban Conservatoire of Music and Dance.

8.12 Within its Higher Education funding provision, the continued exceptional financial support for institutions such as these, should be seen as a priority by the coalition government. This sector of Higher Education trains creative arts leaders, artists and practitioners for the Creative and Cultural Industries, who also act as arts leaders and trainers within the school environment. Without practitioners and teachers at the highest level, the school sector will be unable to deliver the level of training which forms a crucial element of young people's education and development. These institutions also train many of the arts practitioners who gain international recognition for the UK in this area. I strongly urge the Department for Business, Innovation and Skills to work with the Department for Culture, Media and Sport and the Department for Education to ensure that long-term funding settlements are put in place to allow these institutions to continue to thrive.

8.13 Indeed, rather than curtailing the provision of exceptional funding, it may be the right time to examine widening the number of institutions which receive it, given the excellent track record students from the institutions that receive it have in gaining graduate employment, in a sector that is helping to drive forward the government’s growth agenda. Higher education institutions such as (but not necessarily limited to) the University of the Arts London and the University for the Creative Arts are notable by their absence from the list above. Both universities provide high quality intensive training to those who go on to work in the Creative and Cultural Industries.

8.14 It is important for these graduate training institutions to maintain strong links with the Creative and Cultural Industries, so that they are building a workforce with the knowledge and skills required by industry. This might be facilitated through the formation of a new forum chaired by the Culture Minister or the Higher Education Minister, to bring together representatives of the Arts and Heritage sectors, the specialist Higher Education training schools and the relevant publicly funded bodies. This group would ensure that the right training is being delivered to the right people at the right time. It might be sensible for this group to report into the Skillset-led skills work of the recently formed Creative Industries Council.

8.15 There is a good deal of benefit to be gained for schools, pupils and teachers in building long-term high quality relationships with specific artists from across all art forms. I would encourage schools to consider developing Artist-in-Residence schemes, whereby an artist spends a meaningful amount of time working in a school across all year groups. This increases the likelihood of young people gaining a greater understanding of the work and effort necessary over a sustained period to create great art. For the avoidance of doubt, I am not suggesting here that only visual artists would be able to fulfill this role; it would be as appropriate for poets, dancers, film-makers and the like.
9.0 SUPPORTING TALENTED YOUNG PEOPLE

9.1 The Department for Education, Arts Council England and Youth Music currently funds the Music and Dance Scheme, which provides training for our most talented children at specialist Music and Dance schools around the country and through a network of Centres for Advanced Training. This focus on excellent provision enables us to develop the next generation of professional musicians and dancers, providing those with exceptional talent from all backgrounds with the expert support, which they require.

Recommendation 19: A new National Youth Dance Company

A new permanent national youth dance company should be created and funded under the auspices of the Music and Dance Scheme.

9.2 The scheme also funds a group of National Youth Music Organisations (Music for Youth, National Children’s Orchestra, National Youth Brass Band of Great Britain, National Youth Choirs, National Youth Jazz Collective, National Youth Orchestra, South Asian Music Youth Orchestra and Youth Music Theatre UK). I note that despite having ‘Dance’ in its title, there is currently no centrally funded permanent National Youth Dance Company in England, as part of this group. This seems illogical and unfair, considering the number of excellent funded youth arts organisations across the theatre and music sectors. I would encourage the Department for Culture, Media and Sport and the Department for Education to work with Arts Council England to identify ways of developing and funding a new National Youth Dance Company to showcase and nurture young people in England’s magnificent talent in the areas of both contemporary and classical dance.

Recommendation 20: Dance and Drama Awards

The government should continue to fund specialist training in Dance and Drama. However, it should ensure that any future arrangement offers a coherent approach to managing and funding support for the identification and training of exceptionally talented performers. This support should be targeted towards those students who would not otherwise be able to afford to undertake the training courses.
9.3 The Department for Education currently funds Dance and Drama Awards (DaDAs), which provide funding for students who want to work in the performing arts. The courses cover professional acting, dance, music theatre and production schools and are studied at one of 21 accredited institutions. Awards are based on talent and there is no means testing as part of the scheme. This support is valuable and makes a significant difference to the career development of the young people concerned, all of whom show real talent in their chosen area. However, there are inconsistencies and some overlaps in the support currently offered through the Music and Dance Scheme, the Dance and Drama Awards, higher education provision and further education courses, which can be confusing for young people. There has also been significant growth in the range and variety of alternative post-16 routes in the performing arts since the DaDAs were developed.

9.4 Among other sources of potential funding for young people, Lord Andrew Lloyd Webber and Sir Cameron Mackintosh both offer bursaries to provide training in musical theatre. These are funded through their charitable foundations. Initiatives such as these provide a welcome boost to this area of Cultural Education. The government’s recent drive to celebrate and encourage the work of philanthropists, such as Lord Lloyd Webber and Sir Cameron, is very welcome. These individuals, and others like them, have the capacity to make a significant difference to Cultural Education on both a local and national level. Although philanthropists who fund projects and programmes across the country tend to be better known, it should be noted that many businesses and individuals already provide great philanthropic support to local and regional Cultural Education projects. This assistance, which can be practical as well as financial, is enormously valued by the recipient organisations.

9.5 Although the government funds exceptional talent in the area of Music, Dance and Drama through the Music and Dance Scheme and the Dance and Drama Awards, there is no significant equivalent funding in other areas of Cultural Education, covering art and design, literature, museums and galleries, film or heritage activities. The adoption of a programme, such as the one outlined earlier in paragraph 5.18 of this Review, would go some way towards addressing this issue.
10.0 RECOGNISING SUCCESS

10.1 This final section of my Review looks at ways in which best practice in Cultural Education across England can be both highlighted and celebrated.

10.2 Alongside a programme of investment in Cultural Education, it is important that the excellent achievements by both young people and their teachers are recognised and celebrated at the highest level in the coalition government. The Department for Culture, Media and Sport and the Department for Education should undertake an audit of existing Cultural Education Awards schemes and there should be greater ministerial engagement with those that are valued.

Recommendation 21: Downing Street Medals

The government should consider the creation of Downing Street Cultural Education Medals, presented by the Prime Minister or the Deputy Prime Minister.

10.3 These awards would be made regularly to the best school-age cultural practitioners and would be regarded as the highest honour that a young person could receive in this area. They would celebrate real achievement and excellence across all art forms, with winners including the best young authors, poets, artists, actors, craft practitioners, dancers, musicians, film-makers and performers. Headteachers, teachers, cultural organisations and voluntary groups would be encouraged to nominate outstanding candidates. The medals would be presented in Downing Street to the young winners, with their families and teachers in attendance. The presence of the Prime Minister or the Deputy Prime Minister at the presentation would underline the importance placed on achievement in cultural activities by the coalition government. Cultural Education has the capacity to help drive social mobility and it would be of great benefit if these awards could give recognition to children and young people who have achieved in this area against the odds.

Recommendation 22: National Schools Culture Week

In partnership with commercial sponsors, the government should consider the introduction of a National Schools Culture Week across England.

10.4 This could follow a similar format to the recent Lloyds TSB National Schools Sport Week. It would be a celebration of all aspects of Cultural Education in schools and could include performances, exhibitions, workshops, visits from cultural professionals, visits to cultural venues and sites. In short, it would provide a focus on all areas of cultural learning, activities and experiences within schools.

Recommendation 23: Royal Patronage

Arts Council England should consider requesting Royal Patronage for the Arts Award.

10.5 The Duke of Edinburgh Awards are now an established part of school life for many young people across England. Royal patronage of the Arts Award would bring many benefits to the scheme. As well as raising the profile and standing of the Arts Award, Royal patronage from among one of the younger members of the Royal Family could make the Arts Awards more relevant to young people and would allow the scheme to be represented by a nationally known figure on a permanent basis.

Recommendation 24: Cultural Education Ambassadors

It is vitally important that government maintains a strong relationship with cultural practitioners, so it is suggested that an advisory group of top level practitioners, who are household names and well respected for their particular areas of expertise, be recruited to champion Cultural Education to the public at large.

10.6 This outward-facing group of ambassadors (authors, poets, actors, architects, archaeologists, art historians, artists, craftsmen, film-makers, dancers, musicians, performers and curators) would publicly promote the value of Cultural Education. The group would, at least annually, meet ministers from the Department for Culture, Media and Sport, the Department for Business, Innovation and Skills and the Department for Education, as well as lottery distributors. It is essential that those recruited as Cultural Education Ambassadors are willing and able to dedicate a meaningful amount of time to promoting Cultural Education and to working directly with children and young people both in school and out of school. This would be a condition of their membership of the Cultural Ambassadors programme.
11.0 SUMMARY OF RECOMMENDATIONS

Recommendation 1: Broad Cultural Education for all children
There should be a minimum level of Cultural Education that a child should expect to receive during his or her schooling as a whole. For children to leave full-time education without having engaged in the spectrum of Cultural Education outlined below would be a failure of a system which sets out to create young people who are not only academically able, but also have a fully-rounded appreciation of the world around them.

Recommendation 2: Cross-departmental government co-operation
A new cross-Whitehall ministerial group on Cultural Education should be set up, under the chairmanship of the Culture Minister or an Education Minister.

Recommendation 3: A New National Plan
There is currently no over-arching strategy for the commissioning and delivery of Cultural Education in England. The government should develop a single National Cultural Education Plan. This document should set out its ambitions for children and young people in this area, while ensuring the development of a framework that enables these ambitions to be delivered.

Recommendation 4: Arms-length Bodies working together as a partnership
Arts Council England, the Heritage Lottery Fund, the British Film Institute, the Big Lottery Fund and English Heritage should work together to ensure that their individual strategies/plans in the area of Cultural Education cohere in a way that adds up to a single over-arching strategy in line with the government’s stated ambitions. By coming together as a new Cultural Education Partnership Group, this could ultimately result in a single strategic commissioning fund for Cultural Education money in England.
Recommendation 5: A Cultural Education Passport

The CEPG should consider establishing a new Cultural Education Passport scheme for children between the ages of five and nineteen, which records all of their in-school and out of school cultural activities, enabling parents, carers and teachers to understand what each child has achieved and to plug any gaps in knowledge and experience. This would be particularly useful during the transition between primary and secondary schools, where Year 7 pupils may enter a secondary school from a variety of different feeder primaries, each of which has a slightly different programme of Cultural Education.

Recommendation 6: A Cultural Education Website

A single destination website should be created, bringing all Cultural Education resources together in one easily accessible place online.

Recommendation 7: New Local Partnerships

In my Review of Music Education, I stressed the importance of partnerships between classroom teachers, specialist music teachers and professional musicians in the delivery of a truly excellent Music Education to young people. To this end, I recommended the creation of a series of Local Music Education Hubs through which funding would be channeled. The government agreed with the recommendation in its response to my Review and the National Plan for Music Education has detailed how these Hubs will operate. Consideration should now be given to rolling a structure out across the rest of the Cultural Education spectrum, to enable meaningful partnerships on the ground across different art forms and using all of the expertise and venues that are available in a given area. This could be achieved through the further development of Arts Council England’s Bridge Organisations, which currently focus on the arts, to include other cultural areas.

Recommendation 8: Managing Closer Partnerships

More can be done - both by cultural organisations and by schools - to foster closer working partnerships. Each primary and secondary school should nominate a member of the Senior Management Team to act as a Cultural Education Champion. All schools should also have a member of the governing body who has a particular responsibility for and interest in cultural education. This would increase with the recruitment of a greater number of school governors from among the Creative and Cultural Industries. This position should be mirrored in cultural organisations, which should themselves be encouraged to appoint a trustee with particular responsibility for and interest in education. One method for building closer ties would be for each school in England to be adopted by a cultural organisation to build meaningful long-term bonds between the two entities.

Recommendation 9: Design in the Curriculum
Greater priority should be given to the importance of Design as a curriculum subject within schools.

Recommendation 10: Dance and Drama in Schools
Consideration should be given to promoting Dance and Drama to subject areas in their own right, rather than being seen as junior partners to P.E. and English.

Recommendation 11: The Arts Award
Most children and young people should be encouraged to take part in the Arts Award and Junior Arts Award, which should be regarded as a valuable qualification.

Recommendation 12: Artsmark
The scope of the Artsmark Award should be widened to include all areas of cultural education covered by this Review.

Recommendation 13: New guidance from Ofsted
Ofsted should be commissioned to create a guide to working with schools for cultural organisations. This would clearly and unambiguously set out the criteria, which Ofsted uses to judge whether learning is of a high standard. Classroom teachers are currently judged on these criteria and it seems both sensible and desirable for education professionals from the cultural sector to have their work assessed in the same way. The guide would also be of use to Headteachers who are making decisions about what to commission in their own schools.
Recommendation 14: Cultural Education in Ofsted inspections

Ofsted should be encouraged to undertake a review of the standards across all Cultural Education subjects, rather than looking at them in standalone silos. The outcome of this Review would enable a more detailed understanding of the place of Cultural Education in schools in England today. Ofsted should also be encouraged to comment on each individual school’s Cultural Education provision as a specific part of their inspections. These comments would focus on the quantity and quality of cultural activities that take place within the school outside of lesson times, as well as within the school curriculum. It would also take note of the partnership links developed by the school with local cultural organisations.

Recommendation 15: Connecting teachers to industry

A new scheme should be developed across the entire cultural sector to allow teachers to remain in touch with relevant professional developments outside of education. This scheme should include a mechanism for the further dissemination of this learning to other teachers in a local area. Teachers should be helped to build links with industry to ensure that their knowledge remains up-to-date. This could be through relationships with a local design company, theatre or higher education institution. Headteachers should consider whether this would be an effective use of Inset Days for teachers of Cultural Education subjects. Teachers themselves should be encouraged to continue with their artistic practice wherever possible. Many are themselves highly talented in their particular field (as artists, designers, writers, poets, actors, musicians, dancers etc.), but this can sometimes be forgotten. There should be a moment in each school year where this is celebrated either through a performance or exhibition.

Recommendation 16: Training Teachers

Greater focus should be placed on demonstrating both to Newly Qualified Teachers and to experienced teachers the benefits and value of Cultural Education to children and young people. Working with the Cultural Education Partnership Group and the Department for Culture, Media and Sport, the Department for Education should consider commissioning the creation of a package of resources from which teachers of all levels of experience can draw across each art form. Schools should cluster to share expertise in particular areas to show off best practice to Newly Qualified Teachers and mentoring from more experienced teachers should be made available.

Recommendation 17: New qualifications for cultural practitioners

New qualifications aimed at cultural practitioners who also work in the education field should continue to be developed, as these qualifications professionalise and give greater recognition to this part of the workforce.

Recommendation 18: Protecting Funding for the best professional training

The government should recognise the need for exceptional funding for culturally based conservatoires, which train the artists, actors, dancers and musicians who will create and perform the culture of the future. The funding settlements for these conservatoires should be secured for the long-term.

Recommendation 19: A new National Youth Dance Company

A new permanent national youth dance company should be created and funded under the auspices of the Music and Dance Scheme.

Recommendation 20: Dance and Drama Awards

The government should continue to fund specialist training in Dance and Drama. However, it should ensure that any future arrangement offers a coherent approach to managing and funding support for the identification and training of exceptionally talented performers. This support should be targeted towards those students who would not otherwise be able to afford to undertake the training courses.

Recommendation 21: Downing Street Medals

The government should consider the creation of Downing Street Cultural Education Medals, presented by the Prime Minister or the Deputy Prime Minister.
Recommendation 22: National Schools Culture Week

In partnership with commercial sponsors, the government should consider the introduction of a National Schools Culture Week across England.

Recommendation 23: Royal Patronage

Arts Council England should consider requesting Royal Patronage for the Arts Award.

Recommendation 24: Cultural Education Ambassadors

It is vitally important that government maintains a strong relationship with cultural practitioners, so it is suggested that an advisory group of top level practitioners, who are household names and well respected for their particular areas of expertise, be recruited to champion Cultural Education to the public at large.

Review of Cultural Education

April 2011

Please allow me to thank you again for the excellent review of music education that you produced. I am delighted that you have agreed to work again with both the Department for Culture, Media and Sport and the Department for Education to undertake a further review, this time looking at cultural education (ages 5 – 19).

As we stated in the Schools White Paper, the coalition government believes that every child should experience a wide variety of high quality cultural experiences and we would like to ask you to consider how we can ensure that this ambition is realised, ensuring both quality and best use of public investment.

We would also ask you to consider the following as part of this review:

What cultural experiences should be included?

• How can cultural organisations create an offer which fulfils the needs of schools in providing a broad and truly rounded education for their students?

• How can we ensure that all opportunities are as good as the very best?

The review of music education really reflected the breadth of opinion that you canvassed in its production and, whilst this will be more of a challenge across the whole of cultural education, I would urge you to be as open as you can and work with and through our sponsored bodies to ensure that individual sectoral viewpoints are captured too, along with those of schools and parents.

I thought it would be useful to articulate a new set of assumptions that should underpin this review:

• Government recognises the important contribution that our great cultural institutions make to education and intends to support access to and appreciation of the arts and culture
• Public funding should be used primarily to meet the government priorities of every child having a solid cultural education

• Although music was reviewed separately, it forms an integral part of cultural education and so this review should consider how cultural education could be delivered, taking into account that which we have adopted or will adopt in response to your first review of music.

• The focus should be on delivery models which meet the needs of the child or young person as defined by parents and schools rather than being supplier led.

• You should consider how initial teacher training and continuing professional development could better foster links with cultural organisations and artists and what might be required within the cultural sector to improve the quality of the offer.

• There should be clearly defined progression routes and consideration should be given to giving children and young people opportunities to showcase their achievements through performance or exhibition.

• The review should take account of experiences for children and young people both in and out of school.

• In commissioning this review, as was the case with music, no assumptions should be made regarding the position of related subjects within the review of the National Curriculum.

Both Departments will again provide you with the support you require to conduct this review. I would welcome a final report by the end of the year and it would be incredibly helpful we might have early thoughts from you by the summer recess.

Darren Henley is the Managing Director of Global Radio’s national classical music station, Classic FM. He joined in 1992, first as a journalist and then as a programme producer. In 2000, he was appointed Managing Editor, with responsibility for all of the station’s on-air programming. Four years later, he was named Station Manager with a brief that was widened to include all aspects of Classic FM’s business. He was promoted to Managing Director in 2006. He sat on the board of Independent Radio News Ltd from 2008-12 and has been Director of Government Liaison for Global Radio, since 2009.

Since the beginning of 2007, he has worked closely with music educators, ministers and civil servants, as Chairman of the Music Manifesto Partnership and Advocacy Group from 2007-10 and as Chairman of the Tune In Legacy Group from 2009-10. He served on the DCSF/DCMS Music Programme Board from 2007-10 and on the In Harmony Steering Group from 2008-11. He also sat on the Shadow Culture, Media & Sport Independent Review of the Creative Industries in 2009. He authored an independent Review for the DfE and the DCMS into the funding and delivery of Music Education in England (February 2011), which resulted in the government publishing England’s first National Plan for Music Education. He is currently a member of the DfE/DCMS National Plan for Music Education Monitoring Board.

A Vice-President and board director of the Canterbury Festival, he is also a member of the Media Board of the Prince’s Foundation for Children & the Arts and a Patron of the Mayor of London’s Fund for Young Musicians. He was formerly a trustee of the music education charity Future Talent, a member of Arts Council England’s South East Regional Council, a member of the Philharmonia Orchestra’s Business Development Committee and a member of the Broadcast Journalism Training Council.

He is the author of twenty-one books about classical music and musicians, including the first official history of the Royal Liverpool Philharmonic Orchestra (published by Liverpool University Press). His series of classical music audiobook histories for children (published by Naxos Audiobooks) has won awards on both sides of the Atlantic, including receiving a Grammy Award nomination. The Sony Radio Academy Awards and the New York International Radio Festival have honoured his radio programmes. He was named Programmer of the Year at the Arqiva Commercial Radio Awards in 2009.

Darren studied Politics at the University of Hull. He is a Fellow of the Royal Society of Arts, a Fellow of the Radio Academy, an Honorary Fellow of Canterbury Christ Church University, an Honorary Fellow of Trinity Laban Conservatoire of Music and Dance, and a Companion of the Chartered Management Institute.
