Our research shows that GCSE, AS and A level marking is generally good – but there is always room for improvement.

We want to improve confidence by increasing visibility of the system. One approach we are considering is the publication of marking metrics to allow comparison of marking quality on a subject-by-subject and board-by-board basis.

Where schools think that a student has been given the wrong grade they can make an enquiry about their result and appeal that decision. Either could result in a grade change, but might not. If a school is still unhappy with the outcome they can apply to us for a procedure review. We hear only a handful of these annually. Less than 1% of all GCSE and A level grades are changed each year.
